ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Tuesday, January 25, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order, please.

The purpose of the meeting of the committee this morning is to organize. But before we formally organize, I desire to make a brief statement.

Members of the committee, it is with a sense of deep responsibility that I assume my duties as chairman of the Committee on Armed Services. I do so with the earnest hope that I shall be able to maintain the high standards established by my predecessor, a man who not only possessed rare judgment and insight concerning military problems but also a man well beloved and admired by all of us for his courage, energy, devotion, and his straightforward manner and rare good humor.

Ham Andrews faced a staggering task when he took over the chairmanship of the newly merged Armed Services Committee 2 years ago. The future lay before him uncharted. There were no beacons to guide his steps as he embarked upon a completely new venture and faced the task of bringing together the membership of two separate, independent committees, each of which had gone its own way for as long as it had been in existence, and each of which had been charged with the responsibility of legislating for two entirely separate departments of the executive branch of the Government.

If the old adage is true that early marriage is desirable because it avoids the danger of the participants having become too set in their individual ways, the marriage at which the first chairman of this committee was called upon to officiate was not exactly a promising one. But as we look back over the past 2 years we can see for ourselves what the courage, the vision, and the untiring and self-sacrificing devotion of Ham Andrews has made possible.

Not only has this committee been welded together as one group speaking in the Congress for all of the armed services but, even more important, it has steadfastly and consistently brought its influence to bear upon the departments themselves for the purpose of bringing them together so that they may function as one strong, efficient, integrated team.

This is not to say that much does not still remain to be done. Viewed in the light of our expectations at the beginning of the Eightieth Congress, however, the progress which has been made in the past 2 years is almost beyond comprehension.

The achievement toward which our first chairman made so great a contribution by his ceaseless efforts would still not have been possible had it not been for the industry, devotion, and cooperation of every member of the committee.

It was largely because of all of these factors that the new committee was able to report out 59 of the 330 laws enacted during the first session of the Eightieth Congress. Altogether, during both sessions, 158 bills were reported by the committee. Of these, all but 30 subsequently became law. Thus, during the Eightieth Congress the Armed Services Committee wrote upon the statute books 128 different laws.

When the Committee on Armed Services began its existence there were no guideposts to point the way for the future. Those of you who were members of the first committee may remember the observation I made at the first meeting to the effect that the policies laid down by the present members would be the guideposts in the legislative years to come, because they would establish the fundamental precedents to be followed by our successors. I also said at that meeting, and I want to repeat my words again as we start anew upon our work in the Eighty-first Congress:

> I deem it to be the responsibility of this committee to be the policy-making body for all of the armed services. It is incumbent upon us to maintain close scrutiny over the operations of the armed services in requiring full compliance with the policies formulated by the committee and approved by the Congress. We must guarantee to the people of this Nation that every dollar of expenditure authorized by the committee is efficiently utilized. As the Appropriation Committee only appropriates for that which we authorize, it is our duty to strive for rigid economy but not false economy at the expense of placing the Nation's defense in jeopardy.

It is the duty and responsibility of this committee to see to it that we plan our Nation's security upon a sound basis. The paramount duty of government is self-preservation. Let us see that this Government remains strong on land, sea, and in the air, in order that our strength may serve as a deterrent to aggressor nations.

It is our devout hope that we shall be able to maintain peace. But if our hopes for peace are not realized, we should make doubly sure that we are prepared to defend ourselves.

Now, if any conflict of views should arise within the services, I believe it is the duty of this committee to strive with an open mind to ascertain fully and completely all of the facts pertaining to matters about which there may be genuine disagreement among honest men of proven professional ability.

When these men do not see eye to eye it is incumbent upon us to hear all of the facts and arguments on all sides, in order that these controversial issues may be fairly and objectively resolved not in the interest of this or that branch of the service but in the best interest of the people of the United States.

It is a great tirbute to this committee that it has functioned for 2 years without political partisanship. I assure you that so far as it lies within the power of the chairman it will continue to function as a nonpolitical committee and I know I will have the support of each and every member in seeing that this policy will always be maintained.

The composition of the committee has been fixed by the House as 19 for the majority and 14 for the minority. Following the custom and general practice of committees of the House, I have arranged to seat the majority on the right of the chairman and the minority on the left of the chairman.

I have set up on my own volition a policy committee to aid and assist me. This committee is composed of Mr. Brooks, Mr. Kilday, Mr. Durham, Mr. Sasscer, Mr. Short, Mr. Arends, Mr. Cole, and myself.

After consultation with this group, we are submitting to the full committee for its consideration a resolution reelecting the staff of the Eightieth Congress in its entirety, both professional and clerical.

The policy group is also suggesting to you a proposal that the committee work be divided among three subcommittees to be headed respectively by Mr. Brooks, Mr. Kilday, and Mr. Durham. Each of these committees will consist of six members from the majority and five from the minority. They may be designated as Committee No. 1, Committee No. 2, and Committee No. 3, known as Mr. Brooks' subcommittee, Mr. Kilday's subcommittee, and Mr. Durham's subcommittee.

It is further proposed that these subcommittees shall have equal jurisdiction on all bills, and under the rules which have been drafted for your consideration by the policy committee, bills will be assigned to the various subcommittees by the chairman.

In the discharge of our duties, it may also be necessary from time to time, as the work load may require, to refer bills or special matters to temporary additional subcommittees created with the approval of the full committee.

Resolutions which will give effect to all these proposals have been drawn up and will be presented to you at the proper time for your consideration, with the hope that they will meet with your approval.

I am delighted to see so many members who served in the Eightieth Congress are still with us and I congratulate you gentlemen upon having been able to weather the political storm.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the new members who have been elected by the House to serve with us and welcome them as members of the Committee on Armed Services.

And I have the honor of introducing to you Mr. Fisher, of Texas.

Mr. Hardy, of Virginia.

Mr. Green, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Doyle, of California.

Mr. deGraffenried, of Alabama.

Mr. Walsh, of Indiana.

Mr. Clemente, of New York.

Now, the first order of business is——

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Arends.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry indeed that the ranking minority member, Mr. Short, is out of the city, and of course cannot be here. Let me just say that I have listened to the report of the chairman here and I hope I speak for the minority when I say we intend wholeheartedly to keep up the same type of cooperation on a nonpartisan basis that was prevalent here during the last session of the Congress, when we first had what was known as the Armed Services Committee.

It is our intent and our purpose to work with the chairman at all times for the best interests of our country and for our national security.

I cannot help but think of saying one more thing in relation to our former chairman, who did such an outstanding job during the last session of the Congress. In fact, I think Ham worked so hard that in part it did much to break down his health. It is regrettable indeed that it was necessary for him to retire. But he did an outstanding job and I hope, as the time goes on, he will have the self-satisfaction in his own mind and in his own being that it was a job well done and a sincere effort to try to lead the armed services ahead as he did. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for us to be here this morning, and we are glad we are back on this committee to serve with you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Arends.

Mr. KILDAY. May I say a word, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Whether or not the time is appropriate at this moment, I do not know—I will leave it to the discretion of the chairman—but the Chair was so very gracious in his remarks with respect to the former chairman of the committee that I would like to suggest that the committee formally adopt a resolution requesting the clerk to communicate with the former chairman the expression made by the present chairman and the wishes of the committee for a speedy recovery.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to say that I thought the tribute you paid to our former chairman was most in keeping with the respect that we have for him. I think particularly at this time, when we have our new members with us, we can impress upon them the fact that there are no politics in the Armed Services Committee and I think that is proven by the fact that your policy committee is recommending that the entire staff, picked under Republican administration, be retained in the new Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Now, I recognize Mr. Arends.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I present the following resolution. Will somebody read it?

Mr. HARPER. Yes. [Reading:]

Resolved, That the Committee on Armed Services, House of Representatives, adopt the following rules governing the procedure for the committee:

"1. The Committee on Armed Services will meet every Tuesday at 10 a. m. and at such other times as may be fixed by the chairman or by the written request of a majority of the members of the committee.

"2. A Tuesday meeting of the committee may be dispensed with by the chairman, but such action may be reversed by a written request of a majority of the members.

"3. No general proxies may be used for any purpose. A member may vote by special proxy, which must be in writing, dated, signed by the member, and clearly identify the member to whom the proxy is given. The proxy must be filed with the clerk of the committee and must identify the particular bill or resolution and amendments thereto, motion, or other specific matter under consideration. A proxy may not be used for the purpose of establishing a quorum. A proxy may be used in subcommittee or the full committee.

"4. No measure or recommendation shall be reported or tabled by the committee unless a majority of the committee is actually present.

"5. A roll call of the members may be had upon the request of one or more members.

"6. The chairman shall have authority to refer all bills, resolutions, or other matters to any and all subcommittees or to the full committee. A subcommittee to which a bill, resolution, or other matter has been referred shall proceed with all possible diligence, if a majority of a quorum so directs, with appropriate inquiry, and report its findings and recommendations to the full committee, but the chairman of the full committee shall have authority to discharge a subcommittee from consideration of any bill, resolution, or other matter referred thereto and have such measure or matter considered by the full committee. A majority vote of a quorum of a subcommittee will be required to report a bill, resolution, or other matter to the full committee or to table any such measure or matter in the subcommittee.

Digitized by Google

"7. The chairman and the ranking minority member shall serve as ex officio members of all subcommittees and shall have the right to vote on all matters before the subcommittees.

"8. Any member of the full committee may have the privilege of sitting with any subcommittee during its hearings or deliberations and participate therein but shall not have the authority to vote at such hearings or deliberations unless a member of such subcommittee.

"9. Reports and recommendations of a subcommittee shall not be considered by the full committee until after the intervention of three calendar days from the time the report is submitted and printed hearings thereon are available to the members, except that this rule may be waived by a two-thirds vote of a quorum of the committee.

"10. Bills will be taken up for hearing only when called by the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, or by a majority vote of a quorum of the committee or subcommittee. A majority of the committee shall constitute a quorum.

"11. When a witness is before the committee, members of the committee may put questions to the witness only when they have been recognized by the chairman for that purpose.

"12. Members of the committee will have not to exceed 10 minutes to question witnesses, except that this rule may be waived in the discretion of the chairman.

"13. Questions put to witnesses before the committee shall be pertinent to the bill or other subject matter that may be before the committee for consideration.

"14. The time any one member may address the committee on any bill, motion, or other matter under consideration by the committee will be limited to the 10 minutes, and then only when he has been recognized by the chairman, except that this time limit may be waived in the discretion of the chairman.

"15. A private bill will not be reported out by the committee if there are two or more dissenting votes. Once a private bill has been heard and rejected by the committee it will not be taken up again for consideration during the same Congress unless some new evidence sufficient to justify a rehearing has been presented to the committee.

"16. Except as otherwise specified, the rules of the House will govern the procedure of the committee when it is in session."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, these rules are practically the same rules that prevailed during the Eightieth Congress. There are a few little changes and those changes were carefully considered by the policy committee.

I think these rules are so drafted that we can dispose of business and at the same time properly and amply protect the rights of any minority views with respect to any question.

Is there any discussion on the rule?

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question for clarification?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HÉBERT. In connection with the use of the proxy: It specifically says that the proxy will be used for a designated piece of legislation before the committee and that the individual shall designate the individual member to use that proxy.

The CHAIRMAN. Read the rule so we can understand it.

Mr. HÉBERT. Before you read it, Mr. Chairman, the point I direct myself to is: When the general bill, the specific piece of legislation, is before the entire committee and an individual has another member's proxy, has he the power to vote on amendments which will probably be brought to the attention of the committee at that particular time?

The CHAIRMAN. It all depends upon the authority given in the proxy. If the proxy designates bill H. R. 4678 and authorizes the member to vote on that bill and all amendments thereto as he sees best to vote, then he would have the authority to cast a vote on any amendment which might be considered.

Mr. HÉBERT. In other words, you cannot anticipate the amendment to be presented but the member having the proxy would have full authority to vote on the amendment if the proxy so states.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. If the proxy so states.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Rivers.

Mr. RIVERS. It is difficult to remember all those proposals. Have all members, particularly the new members, a copy?

Mr. HARPER. They have.

The CHAIRMAN. These rules will be printed. Each one has a copy now. They will be mailed to you and printed in the calendar. You will print them in the calendar?

Mr. HARPER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions on the rules?

Mr. KILDAY. May I say, Mr. Chairman, on the proxy situation: I have suggested that a form be printed so that we would have a definite, fixed form on which to proceed. We have been writing in the past on slips of paper and backs of cigarette books and everything else around here.

Mr. HÉBERT. I think that is a splendid idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to inquire if the 10-minute limitation on time also applies to the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes. But I trust that the chairman would be able at least to elicit information from the witnesses that would call for hesitancy on the part of the committee to give him any more latitude.

Now, any further questions on the adoption of the rules?

If not, the rules are adopted.

Now, I recognize Mr. Kilday for offering a resolution.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a resolution:

Resolved, That the following persons be and the same are hereby elected to the professional staff of the Committee on Armed Services, House of Representatives, pursuant and subject to Public Law 601 (79th Cong.), and the rules with amendments thereto (81st Cong.), to fill the following positions respectively, it being understood that according to the provisions of this law, the chairman will fix the basic salary per annum, and that letters in duplicate will be executed on behalf of the committee by the chairman and the ranking minority member and accepted by the employees, these agreements to be deposited in the safe of the committee:

John Russell Blandford, Buffalo, N. Y., professional staff.
Robert W. Smart, Aurora, Mo., professional staff.
Clinton B. D. Brown, New York, N. Y., professional staff.
Bryce N. Harlow, Oklahoma City, Okla., professional staff.

I move its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved that the professional staff whose names have been read be elected by the full committee under the rules and regulations implementing the Reorganization Act as applicable to them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I second the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say this. I think of all committees in Congress we are the most fortunate as far as the professional staff is concerned. We have an outstanding, able professional staff. We are all acquainted with the work they did last year. They have performed their duties in a most faithful and efficient manner. They are willing to cooperate with each and every member.

Any time you gentlemen need them to carry on your legislative work in connection with your services on the committee, have no hesitancy in calling upon them. You will find them willing and you will find them exceedingly qualified to do what you desire done.

Digitized by Google

Without objection, the professional staff is reelected.

Now, it is incumbent upon the Chair to fix the basic salary. I fix the basic salary of the professional staff at $8,000.

Now I recognize the gentleman from New York, Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a resolution which I hand to the clerk, and move its adoption:

Mr. HARPER (reading):

Resolved, That the following persons be, and the same are hereby, elected to the clerical staff of the Committee on Armed Services, House of Representatives, pursuant and subject to Public Law 601 (79th Cong.), and the rules and amendments thereto (81st Cong.), to fill the following positions respectively, it being understood that according to the provisions of this law, the chairman will fix the basic salary per annum, and that letters in duplicate will be executed on behalf of the committee by the chairman and ranking minority member and accepted by the employees, these agreements to be deposited in the safe of the committee:

Robert H. Harper, Milledgeville, Ga., chief clerk.
James Deakins, Pikesville, Tenn., assistant clerk.
Agnes H. Johnston, Camillus, N. Y., secretary.
Rosemary Curry, Johnstown, Pa., stenographer.
Gladys Flanagan, Tyler, Tex., stenographer.
Berniece Kalinowski, North Judson, Ind., stenographer.

The CHAIRMAN. Anything to say with reference to retaining the clerical staff? You will find they also are very highly qualified.

Without objection, the sense of the full committee is expressed in electing the clerical staff.

Now, I have fixed the pay of the clerk, the base pay, at $8,000. The base pay of the stenographers is fixed at $3,080; the assistant clerk at $2,610; and Miss Johnston, the secretary, at $3,360.

Now, there is one member of the clerical staff who was employed by the investigating committee and its money ran out on the 3d day of January. She has been working here since the 3d day of January. I am asking authority to make the payment of her salary for the first part of January retroactive by giving her enough pay for the balance of January to make up for the time that she was not on the pay roll. Then her pay will go back to $3,080. That is the lady from Texas, Miss Flanagan.

Without objection, the Chair is authorized to follow the course just indicated.

Now, I will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer a resolution and move its adoption, which I hand to the clerk:

Mr. HARPER (reading):

Resolved, That in the employment of the professional and clerical staffs of this committee, the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee be authorized to sign agreements with the members of said staffs, which agreements shall be in duplicate and in the following form:

"_____, 194__.

"DEAR _____: This letter is to confirm our agreement with respect to the conditions of your employment as _____ by the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives.

"As you know, your employment and service with the committee will at all times be subject to the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (Public Law 601, 79th Cong.), the rules of the House approving said act, with amendments thereto, or any authority vested in this committee or the chairman thereof by such act or rules.

"Your basic salary will be at the rate of $___ _____ per annum, which, together with increases provided by existing law, will in the aggregate amount to

Digitized by Google

$_____ per annum. Said salary shall, of course, be subject to any withholding taxes required by law, or retirement deductions in the event you should elect to come under the provisions of the Civil Service Retirement Act.

"When your selection has been confirmed, as provided for in said Public Law 601, the term of your employment and other conditions thereof shall be subject to the said law, any amendments thereto, or rules of the House.

"In the event you should at any time desire to terminate your service with the committee, you are to give to the chairman at least 30 days' advance notice. Should it be necessary to dispense with your services, you are to be given similar notice, in which event you would be credited pro rata for any vacation time due you.

"Your vacation period shall be on the basis of 1 month per year of service, at such time as shall be approved by the chairman.

"Your signature below will indicate the acceptance of the above terms and conditions of your employment.

"Very truly yours,

"_____
"Chairman.

"Ranking Minority Member."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection on the part of the committee, Mr. Short and I will address that type of communication to each one of the professional and clerical staff.

Now I recognize Mr. Sasscer.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a resolution. I ask the clerk to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a very important resolution. Pay strict attention.

Mr. HARPER (reading):

Resolved, That the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives be organized to consist of 3 subcommittees to be known as Subcommittee 1, Subcommittee 2, and Subcommittee 3, to be composed of 11 members each, 6 to represent the majority to be designated by the chairman, and 5 to represent the minority to be designated by the ranking minority member. The chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member of the committee shall serve as ex officio members on each subcommittee and shall have the right to vote and participate in all proceedings of the subcommittees. The next ranking member of each subcommittee shall be designated as vice chairman of said subcommittee.

All subcommittees shall have equal jurisdiction over all bills referred to the Armed Services Committee, but shall consider only such bills as are referred to them by the chairman of the full committee.

The subcommittee chairmen and members of the above enumerated subcommittees shall be as follows:

Subcommittee No. 1: Overton Brooks, chairman; L. Mendel Rivers, vice chairman; Philip J. Philbin; Arthur Winstead; Porter Hardy, Jr.; Edward deGraffenried; Paul W. Shafer; W. Sterling Cole; Jack Z. Anderson; Leon H. Gavin; Walter Norblad; Joseph R. Farrington.

Subcommittee No. 2: Paul J. Kilday, chairman; James J. Heffernan, vice chairman; Edward Hébert; Melvin Price; William J. Green, Jr.; John R. Walsh; George J. Bates; W. Sterling Cole; Charles H. Elston; Leroy Johnson; Harry L. Towe; Edward L. Bartlett.

Subcommittee No. 3: Carl Durham, chairman; Lansdale G. Sasscer, vice chairman; Franck Havenner; O. C. Fisher; Clyde Doyle; L. Gary Clemente; Leslie C. Arends; Charles H. Elston; J. Parnell Thomas; William W. Blackney; James E. Van Zandt; A. Fernós-Isern.

In addition to the above regular standing subcommittees, there shall be a policy subcommittee composed of the following members: Mr. Vinson, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Kilday, Mr. Durham, Mr. Sasscer, Mr. Short, Mr. Arends, Mr. Cole.

The subcommittees shall meet upon the call of the subcommittee chairmen.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, after much thought and after consultation with the policy committee, I am asking that we start our work in the manner indicated in the resolution. If we find that we cannot meet the problems that come before us in this manner, why, then, we will have another consultation about it and see what we can do to expedite consideration of the bills.

But I firmly believe that this method that is proposed is a very sound one. Each subcommittee will have complete jurisdiction of every bill. Bills will not be assigned on jurisdictional subjects. The bills will be assigned to the various subcommittees as always, taking into consideration the work load of that particular committee. Therefore, every member of the committee will become conversant with all the different phases of the armed services. I think that is a very desirable thing to bring about. Instead of members just becoming conversant with personnel legislation they will become conversant with all types of legislation—matériel, personnel, and any other subject matter that may be referred to them.

Now, if it so develops that we cannot turn out the business in this method, of course, we will have to make such changes as may be necessary.

And oftentimes there will be a great many bills relating to easements and matters of not very much importance and then I will ask the committee for the authority to designate a small group of members to consider such matters. I think if we start off in this way we will have a general knowledge of all phases of the services and every member will know something about each and every one of the branches of the service.

So I am hoping that you will adopt this resolution and let us see if this is not as sound a basis as any that can be thought of, for the time being, upon which to commence our work.

Any comments from any members of the committee? If not, the resolution presented by Mr. Sasscer is adopted.

Now, the next matter is the appointment of special subcommittees to handle approvals of disposals and leases under Public Law 289 of the Seventy-eighth Congress. Have you that resolution?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Read that resolution.

Mr. HARPER. The resolution is:

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO HANDLE APPROVAL AND DISAPPROVAL OF LEASES UNDER PUBLIC LAW 289, SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS

Members of the committee, as most of you know, Public Law 289 of the Seventy-eighth Congress provides in part as follows:

"That prior to the acquisition or disposal, by lease or otherwise, of any land acquired for naval use under the authority of this, or any other Act, the Secretary of the Navy shall come into agreement with the Naval Affairs Committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives with respect to the terms of such prospective acquisitions or disposals; and recital of compliance with this proviso in any instrument of conveyance by the Secretary of the Navy under authority of this or any other Act shall be conclusive evidence of the Secretary's compliance with this proviso as to the property conveyed."

During the Eightieth Congress, the approval of these leases was handled by Mr. Bates' subcommittee and I desire to appoint a special subcommittee to go over each of these leases and report their recommendations to the full committee. I designate the following members——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait 1 minute.

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, is there any objection to having the authority to appoint a special subcommittee of four to pass upon the acquisitions and disposals and then report back to the full committee?

Digitized by Google

Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair shall have the authority to appoint a special committee of four.

Now read on.

Mr. HARPER (continuing reading):

I designate the following members to serve on such a subcommittee: Mr. Sasscer, Mr. Philbin, Mr. Cole, Mr. Bates, Mr. Vinson, and Mr. Short ex officio.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in that connection, while this subject is up, I think it is highly important that we have our staff prepare a bill covering the Army and the Air Force with reference to all acquisitions and disposals of land and that we should have the same jurisdiction over those two Departments as well as over the Navy Department.

So I am asking Mr. Smart to prepare a bill for the consideration of the full committee at a later date.

Mr. KILDAY. May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we put that in some other legislation to avoid the possibility of veto?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that might be a good idea. But it is sufficient to stand on its own merits. It is clearly within the authority of Congress to have a voice in disposals.

Now, there may be some doubt as to the constitutionality of acquisitions, but there is not any question as to disposals. Congress has always had the right to have a voice in disposals. Now of course the weakness of our position is that it is not Congress but it is the committee. That might raise a question. But we will cross that bridge when we get to it. So, Mr. Smart, fix up a bill and we will have that to consider.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, we will designate Mr. Brown, of the professional staff, to carry on this work as he did under Mr. Bates. I want to compliment you on your work and I hope your records are all up to date. I have not checked on it but I am trusting it is all right, so that we will all know what is going on.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, just to clarify that, I understand that this subcommittee is just for acquisitions and disposition of real estate.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. I might say I served on that committee for 2 years and I am glad Mr. Sasscer has that and not me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I think it is a fine control. I want this committee to have something to do with running the departments instead of the departments just telling the committee what they are going to do.

The next matter is the appointment of the special committee to handle the disposal of special properties by the Department of the Navy.

You see, gentlemen, a great many of these things relate specifically to the Navy because when we were guiding the destinies of the Navy we felt that the committee should have a hand in a great many things.

I feel that same way with reference to all of the armed services.

Mr. HARPER (reading):

Public Law 629, Seventy-ninth Congress, which provided for the disposition of vessels, trophies, relics, and material of historical interest by the Secretary of the Navy, contained a provision as follows:

"SEC. 6. No transfer, loan, or gift authorized by section 1 or 2 of this Act shall take effect until information of the proposal to make such transfer, loan, or gift has been transmitted to the Congress. The transfers authorized by section 1 of this Act shall take effect upon the expiration of the first period of sixty calendar days of continuous session of the Congress following the date on which information of the proposal to make such transfer is transmitted to the Congress; but only if, between the date of transmittal and the expiration of such sixty-day period there has not been passed by the two Houses a concurrent resolution stating in substance that the Congress does not favor the proposed transfer. The loans and gifts authorized by section 2 of this Act shall take effect upon the expiration of the first period of thirty calendar days of continuous session of the Congress following the date on which information of the proposal to make such loan or gift is transmitted to the Congress; but only if, between the date of transmittal and the expiration of such thirty-day period, there has not been passed by the two Houses a concurrent resolution stating in substance that the Congress does not favor the proposed loan or gift."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to appointing a subcommittee to consider these matters? If not, the Chair designates the following members to constitute this subcommittee.

Mr. HARPER (continuing reading):

Mr. Heffernan, Mr. Rivers, Mr. Winstead, Mr. deGraffenried, Mr. Walsh; Mr. Clemente, Mr. Elston, Mr. Leroy Johnson, Mr. Towe.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the next matter is the appointment of a special subcommittee to handle miscellaneous reports to the committee required by the law.

Mr. HARPER (reading):

During the course of previous Congresses, the Military Affairs Committee and Naval Affairs Committee have written provisions into various acts of Congress requiring the submission of annual and semiannual reports covering a number of items.

In addition, the Departments, of their own volition, from time to time send reports to the committee.

In order that each of these reports may be carefully studied, I desire to designate a special subcommittee for their consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Any objection to designating this subcommittee? If not, I designate the following members.

Mr. HARPER (continuing reading):

Mr. Hébert, Mr. Havenner, Mr. Price, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Green, Mr. Doyle, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Shafer, Mr. Norblad, Mr. Van Zandt, Mr. Vinson, and Mr. Short ex officio.

Special reports already on file with the committee are:

1. Report from the Secretary of Defense setting forth the number of positions established pursuant to Public Law 313, Eightieth Congress, in the National Military Establishment during that calendar year, and the name, rate of compensation, and description of qualifications of each incumbent together with a statement of the functions performed by each.
2. First report of the Secretary of Defense.
3. Annual report of the Secretary of the Navy.
4. Annual report of the Secretary of the Air Force.
5. Report from the Secretary of Interior showing the amount of moneys credited to helium production fund and the amount of disbursements made therefrom during the preceding fiscal year, and the unexpended and unobligated balances on hand in such fund as of the end of such fiscal year.
6. Report from the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics showing contracts negotiated by NACA.
7. Report from the Secretary of the Navy for the period ending June 30, 1948, of real and personal property leased by the Department of the Navy.
8. Report from the Secretary of the Army showing transportation provided for certain Government and other personnel.
9. Report from the Secretary of the Navy showing transportation provided for certain Government and other personnel.
10. Report from the Secretary of Defense listing the contracts for research and development and industrial mobilization awarded by the Departments of the National Military Establishment from May 19, 1948, through June 30, 1948.

Digitized by Google

11. Report from the Secretary of Navy listing officers above the rank of major in the Army or lieutenant commander of the Navy with the average monthly flight pay authorized by law to be paid to such officers.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, that completes the organizational resolutions that it is essential to adopt.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the subcommittee that the Chair has just announced, to my mind it is probably the most important subcommittee of the entire group. I am just wondering what plans the Chair has with respect to studies of these reports, whether one member of the professional group would be assigned to this committee or whether the reports would be parceled out to various members of the staff.

The CHAIRMAN. What method did you follow last year, Mr. Harper?

Mr. HARPER. Well, we had a little different procedure because we referred these to the standing subcommittees which had jurisdiction. Thus, transfers of vessels were referred to Mr. Hess' subcommittee and the smaller items went to Mr. Anderson's subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a very important committee and I suggest that Mr. Blandford be requested to consider all these reports.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is too big a load for any one staff member to handle.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, after we read the various Secretaries' reports, we will have a pretty good idea what they want. I finished Mr. Forrestal's report. I am now reading Mr. Symington's. It is entirely left to the desire of the members whether or not they wish to go into these reports. We would not ask them to read them all. I am afraid a great many of you do not have time to read even the reports of the Naval Academy and West Point.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the group also furnish a summary of these reports for the rest of us?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; we will have all that done and broken down.

Mr. Blandford, you try to help out on this as much as you can.

Mr. BLANDFORD. All right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, that finishes the necessary resolutions relating to the organization.

Now, I would like the clerk to have the stationery printed and after it is printed I would like to have you parcel some of it out to each of the members of the committee so that they can have committee stationery on which to write letters relating to committee matters.

Now, another thing: It is left with the committee to select the reporter, isn't it?

Mr. HARPER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you reported last year and if there is no objection—you did a very fine job and I hope you can continue to report for us this session——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, for information, is it the responsibility of the committee, the majority of the committee, to pick the reporter? It seems to me that is the prerogative of the chairman and, if so, I do not like to have a precedent established.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Then, I will pick him.

Old boy, you can stay here as long as you deliver the goods.

Now, members of the committee, the armed services at the Pentagon desire that the committee meet with them tomorrow at 10 o'clock for a briefing which they desire to give with reference to the national defense. It is a very important meeting. They will furnish transportation from here to the Pentagon. The House does not have anything on the calendar. So it will probably take two and a half hours or a little bit longer.

And lunch will be served over there. It is one of the most important meetings that will take place in many months and it is highly secret.

Members must not divulge anything that is said over there. If it meets with the approval of the committee, those who want to go will be here in the morning promptly at 10 o'clock.

Mr. HARPER. 9:30, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. 9:30. I wish every member to be on hand.

Mr. HARPER. The transportation will wait downstairs between these two buildings right outside this window.

Mr. RIVERS. Whose office are we going to?

Mr. HARPER. Forrestal's.

The CHAIRMAN. Every one of you gentlemen try to be on hand. You will meet at the foot of the steps. Then we will go over there.

Now, how many members can indicate now that they desire to go? (Hands raised.)

The CHAIRMAN. I want every member to go, because the policy committee has gone over this briefing in advance. We know what they are going to say in a general way. It is highly secret and must be strictly confidential.

There must be no leaks. The professional staff, with the clerk, is also invited.

Now, on Thursday we will start a hearing by the full committee on H. R. 1437, a bill setting up the composition of the Army and the Air Force. The departments have only sent up four bills. They were introduced yesterday by Mr. Kilday, Mr. Cole, Mr. Brooks, and Mr. Durham, and they have been assigned to the different subcommittees.

So unless the departments send up something, we are not going to be quite as busy right now as we have been in the past in the beginning of a session, when you consider that we passed 128 laws last year.

We dotted every "i" and crossed every "t" that the services could think of, in addition to writing some very fundamental legislation.

So if there is nothing——

Mr. ARENDS. Could I ask one thing?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. One thing came to my desk and I have not looked at it carefully. The committee was invited to go to Aberdeen or some place, on the 31st of January.

Mr. HARPER. I have not heard of it.

Mr. ARENDS. I do not have to pay any attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Air Force wants the committee to go over here to Patuxent at a little later date to witness some sort of demonstration. We will get around to that.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Rivers.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RIVERS. What is the position of the policy committee or the full committee with respect to bills introduced by members?

The CHAIRMAN. I wrote the Department yesterday and sent them—how many bills?

Mr. HARPER. One hundred and six bills.

The CHAIRMAN. I went to see Forrestal yesterday—I sent him 106 bills—and told him if reports were not back here by the 5th day of March we would start hearings irrespective of the reports.

Now, I did that for the purpose of enforcing upon the departments the necessity for reaching a decision and giving us the benefit of their views.

I do not think we will have to have hearings on more than one or two bills without having received reports from the departments. They must answer these letters and give reports—yes or no—in a reasonable length of time. I think 30 days for the 106 bills is ample time.

Mr. RIVERS. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, is there anything further any members want to bring before the committee?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Anderson.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am sure I speak for the minority when I express the appreciation of those sitting to the Chairman's left for the very kind reference to the work done during the Eightieth Congress. We did not hear much of that during the past few months.

The CHAIRMAN. One minute. There is a report submitted by Mr. Anderson with reference to an investigation into the operation of Navy Ships Service Stores. I ask that the report be printed. It is a very fine report.

The CHAIRMAN. Anything else from the committee?

If not, we will recess until tomorrow morning at 9:30 to proceed to the office of the Secretary of Defense.

(Whereupon, the committee adjourned.)

PART II. DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

STATIONS AND FACILITIES

1. Submit by State and by location in each State all property owned by or under the jurisdiction of the Army. Identify the use to which each such piece of property is being put.

Answer: This information is so voluminous that it is considered inadvisable to include it in this summarized report. However, the information is on file with the Chief Clerk and may be obtained from him by members of the committee.

2. List Army installations beyond the continental limits, the mission of each, and the strength of their complements.

Answer: For reasons of military security the rather extensive list of these installations and the other data requested cannot be printed in this report for public distribution. However, the information has been furnished to the committee and is on file with the Chief Clerk. It may be obtained from him by members of the committee.

PERSONNEL [1]

1. Give the present authorized and actual strength (as of December 1, 1948) of officers and enlisted personnel in the Army.

	Officers	Enlisted men	Aggregate
Authorized strength of the Army (no authorized break-down)			837,000
Plus 1-year trainees			110,000
Total			947,000
Budget appropriation as of Jan. 1, 1949	90,000	618,000	708,000
Command strength as of Nov. 1, 1948 [2]	72,936	573,926	646,862

[1] Where data as of Dec. 1, 1948, is not yet obtainable, the latest available figures have been submitted.
[2] Command strength includes all officers, both Army and Air Force, on duty with the Army. It is the basis used for strength accounting purposes.

Departmental strength, Regular Army officers by permanent grade as of Nov. 1, 1948 [1]

Generals of the Army	2	Captains	6,673
Major generals	101	First lieutenants	5,046
Brigadier generals	106	Second lieutenants	1,196
Colonels	2,076	Warrant officers	243
Lieutenant colonels	2,684
Majors	4,499	Total	22,626

[1] This tabulation is on a departmental rather than a command basis. The discrepancy of 608 officers represents the difference between the number of Army officers on duty with the Air Force and the number of Air Force officers on duty with the Army. The permanent grades of non-Regular officers are not shown because these officers hold their permanent grades in their respective components and not in the Regular Army.

PERSONNEL

1. Give the present authorized and actual strength (as of December 1, 1948) of officers and enlisted personnel in the Navy.

Answer: As of November 30, 1948, authorized and actual strengths (preliminary) of naval personnel on active duty were as follows:

	Authorized	Actual
Active Regular Establishment:
Officers, line and staff, including nurses	51,664	42,021
Warrant officers	[1] 4,218	3,989
Enlisted	500,000	375,125
1-year trainees: Enlisted	30,000	8,782
Continuous active duty under appropriation "Naval Reserve":
Officers	1,380	1,283
Enlisted	12,723	12,288
Officer candidates:
Midshipmen (Naval Academy)	[2] 4,402	3,307
Midshipmen (aviation)	----------	2,283
NavCads	----------	132

[1] This figure is actual number of CWO and WO on the active list of the Navy on Jan. 1, 1948. Statutory law does not prescribe an authorized number of CWO and WO. The number is governed by appropriation limitations.

[2] Includes 26 from other American Republics as designated by the President.

2. Give the number of officers in each grade (permanent and temporary).

Answer: The number of officers in each grade of the active Regular Establishment on October 31, 1948, the latest date for which detailed information is available, was as follows:

Rank	Active Regular Establishment, present grade	Active Regular USN		All other USNR, USN (ret) USN-T

Midshipmen (aviation)	257	5	262

In addition to the above, the following personnel on continuous active duty under appropriation Naval Reserve were serving ashore outside the United States:

Enlisted	10

NOTE.—The information given above is the physical location of the personnel listed. Fleet commands administer many activities in continental United States such as amphibious training bases and fleet training centers, and personnel attached to such activities are not considered to be at sea and are not included in above tabulation.

4. Give the number of officers (by grade) and enlisted personnel assigned to continental shore duty (other than in the Navy Department, Washington, D. C.)

Answer: On October 31, 1948, the latest date for which detailed information is available, the following naval personnel were assigned to duty within the continental limits of the United States. Those assigned to the Navy Department are excluded:

	Active Regular Establishment	Continuous active duty under appropriation "Naval Reserve"		Active Regular Establishment	Continuous active duty under appropriation "Naval Reserve"

PART IV.—DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE

STATIONS AND FACILITIES

1. Submit by State and by location in each State all property owned by or under the jurisdiction of the Air Force. Identify the use to which each such piece of property is being put.

Answer: This information is so voluminous that it is considered inadvisable to include it in this summarized report. However, the information is available to committee members upon request of the Chief Clerk.

2. List the Air Force installations beyond the continental limits, the mission of each, and the strength of their complements.

Answer: For reasons of security the list of these installations and the other data requested cannot be printed in this report. However, the information is available to committee members upon request of the Chief Clerk.

PERSONNEL

1. Give the present authorized and actual strength (as of December 1, 1948) of officers and enlisted personnel in the Air Force.

Estimated command strength compared with authorized strength (as of Dec. 1, 1948)

	Authorized strength	Estimated actual strength
Officers	56,000	52,500
Enlisted	360,000	356,800
Total	416,000	409,300

NOTE.—"Command strength" includes all military personnel under the jurisdiction of the U. S. Air Force, irrespective of the basic departmental status of the individual. Includes personnel of the Department of the Army when assigned for duty with the Air Force, but does not include approximately 4,500 Air Force personnel under the command jurisdiction of the U. S. Army. "Authorized strength" is a distribution of the President's ceiling requirement for Dec. 31, 1948, as amended by the Secretary of Defense. The ceiling figure is exclusive of 1-year trainees.

Answer: As of October 31, 1948, there were 2,702 civilian employees on duty with headquarters, United States Air Force, in Washington, D. C., and there were 4,657 civilians on duty in Washington, D. C., metropolitan district.

6. Give the number of civilian employees of the Air Force in the continental United States (other than in Washington, D. C.).

Answer: As of October 31, 1948, there were 125,659 civilian employees on duty in continental United States (other than those on duty in headquarters, United States Air Force, Washington, D. C.), and there were 123,704 Air Force civilian employees in continental United States (other than those on duty in Washington, D. C., metropolitan district).

7. Give the number of civilian employees of the Air Force outside the United States.

Answer: As of October 31, 1948, there were 27,391 [1] civilian employees of the Air Force outside continental United States.

8. Give the strength of the Air Reserve and the Air National Guard, indicating how many are being actively trained.

Air Reserve and Air National Guard strength indicating the status of training

PART I. AIR RESERVE

	Air Reserve strength as of Sept. 30, 1948	Number who have received training during September 1948 [1]
		Active duty [2]	Inactive duty [3]
Officers	232,903	1,204	29,571
Enlisted	187,316	583	8,389
Total	420,219	1,787	37,960

PART II. AIR NATIONAL GUARD

	Air National Guard strength as of Oct. 31, 1948	Number in training [4]
Officers	4,874	4,874
Enlisted	26,095	26,095
Total	30,969	30,969

[1] No data are available on the actual number of air reservists who are actually receiving training at any specified time; data are maintained on the number of persons on whom training has been accomplished. All reservists having assignments to T/O&E units (43,320) are subject to continuous inactive duty within the limitations imposed by availability of appropriations.

[2] Active duty training includes individual or unit training accomplished by U. S. Air Force Reserve personnel who are called to active duty for any of the following purposes:

1. Annual training periods of 15 days.
2. Attendance at courses of instruction at service schools.
3. Duty as instructor at Air ROTC summer camps for periods not to exceed 90 days.
4. Attendance at command post exercises for periods not to exceed 4 days.
5. Annual training periods, not to exceed 21 days, with Air National Guard units undergoing field maneuvers.

[3] Inactive duty training includes:

1. Individual or unit training accomplished by USAF Reserve personnel voluntarily and without specific orders which place such personnel on active-duty status.
2. Duly authorized and scheduled period of instruction or other appropriate duty for pay purposes of at least 2 hours' duration conducted by a USAFR T/O&E unit.

[4] All men assigned to the Air National Guard are subject to continuous training.

[1] Paid from appropriated funds.

[No. 3]

REPORT OF INVESTIGATION INTO THE OPERATION OF NAVY SHIPS' SERVICE STORES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington 25, D. C., January 10, 1949.

Hon. CARL VINSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CARL: During the second session of the Eightieth Congress, Subcommittee No. 6 on Procurement and Supply, of which I was then chairman, authorized me and Mr. Brown of the professional staff to conduct an investigation into the operation of Navy ships' service stores. The committee's action was prompted by the receipt of numerous complaints to the effect that the Navy Ships' Store Office in New York was exercising improper control over the procurement of merchandise locally by individual ships' service stores.

The investigation in question was conducted by Mr. Brown at my direction during the recess period and I am enclosing herewith a copy of the report which he has prepared.

Due to the fact that there was no opportunity to hold any committee meetings immediately prior to the expiration of the Eightieth Congress, no formal action was taken by my subcommittee or by the full committee upon this report. However, I would like at this time to record my personal approval of the report and to recommend for your consideration the conclusions and recommendations set forth therein.

While I am fully in accord with the first recommendation—namely, that no changes in the Navy store system be made at this time—I think you will agree that the detailed findings in the report tend to support the second recommendation, namely, that the committee continue a close surveillance of the operations of the Navy Ships' Store Office. I believe these findings clearly demonstrate that the efforts of our committee have been responsible to a considerable extent for the progress which has been made to date; and, by the same token, it seems to me that they suggest the advisability of continued vigilance on the part of the committee to insure against any possible return in the future to some of the undesirable conditions which existed a year or two ago.

During the hearings held in March 1947 by Subcommittee No. 6, relative to this problem, you asked Mr. Kenney and Mr. Royall to conduct a joint study as to the possibility of adopting a uniform procedure for the purchase of merchandise for resale by Army post exchanges and Navy ships' service stores. Following your suggestion, the subcommittee formally requested that such a study be made and that a report of this study be submitted to the committee not later than June 1, 1947.

Digitized by Google

Such a report was made some months later and is included in the printed record of the subcommittee's hearings. While this report sets forth certain objections to the consolidation of the two activities, a careful reading of the actual study upon which it was based convinces me that these objections are largely superficial and could easily be obviated, and I might add that it seems very significant that no material progress has been made in the period of nearly 2 years which has elapsed since this study was made by the services.

In view of the foregoing, I would like to recommend strongly your favorable consideration of recommendation No. 3 in the attached report.

I do not know whether or not you may desire to have the new committee formally adopt this report, or whether you will wish to have it printed. However, I would like to suggest that such action be taken as will permit notification of the Secretary of the Navy as to the results of the investigation, inasmuch as he was formally advised that this inquiry would be undertaken, by letter dated June 15, 1948.

Sincerely yours,

JACK Z. ANDERSON, M. C.

BACKGROUND AND SCOPE OF INVESTIGATION

In accordance with instructions of the chairman of Subcommittee No. 6 on Procurement and Supply, Hon. Jack Z. Anderson, of California, an investigation into the operation of the Navy ships' service store program was conducted during the recess period by a member of the professional staff. This investigation was concerned primarily with the role played in that program by the Navy Ships' Store Office, an agency of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts to which has been delegated responsibility for general supervision of the operations of individual ships' service stores throughout the Naval Establishment. The Navy Ships' Store Office maintains its office in Brooklyn, N. Y.

Digitized by Google

The investigation covered by this report dealt solely with the relationship between the central office in Brooklyn and individual ships' service stores located at various naval stations throughout the country and related in no way to recent complaints which have reached the committee concerning alleged unfair competition by Army and Navy stores with civilian retail enterprise.

The present inquiry addressed itself primarily to the question whether the Navy Ships' Store Office fulfills a useful and necessary function in the successful operation of the over-all ships' service program or whether, on the other hand, it affords the means for an unnecessary and undesirable centralization of control over local stores, particularly in connection with their procurement activities.

As a corollary to the principal question, the investigation sought also to determine whether satisfactory operating relationships exist between the central office and activities in the field. In addition, an effort was made to ascertain whether any evidence was available which would tend to supplement or destroy certain evidence previously received by the committee in support of allegations to the effect that personnel in the program were not giving their full support to a directive issued by the Navy Department in July 1947 at the request of Subcommittee No. 6. Further reference will be made in this report to the above directive and to alleged violations thereof.

The present investigation was conducted against a background of hearings held by the committee in 1947 as a result of complaints by wholesalers, jobbers, and other distributors who claimed that they had formerly supplied ships' service stores at a time when these stores were operated individually, prior to the institution of a centralized system under the direction of the Navy Ships' Store Office in New York. These suppliers alleged, however, that since the "take-over" of the stores by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts and its operating agency, the Navy Ships' Store Office, they had found it extremely difficult to do business with the stores.

In July 1947, upon the conclusion of the hearings before Subcommittee No. 6, a resolution was adopted by the full committee requesting the Navy Department to take immediate steps to decentralize control over the procurement of merchandise for resale in Navy ships' service stores. The resolution set forth in explicit terms the committee's desire that this control be decentralized from the Navy Ships' Store Office in New York to the local store level.

As a result of the committee's request, the Navy Department proposed the issuance of a new directive which would liberalize existing merchandise procurement policies by granting authority to the local ships' service officer to purchase any item for which he found a local demand to exist and which in his best judgment was a desirable item for resale. This directive provided that no confirmation or clearance of purchase orders need be obtained from the district ships' service officer or the Navy Ships' Store Office in New York but merely required that copies of purchase orders be forwarded to the central office for administrative review. The directive was submitted in draft form by the Navy Department to the subcommittee for its approval prior to promulgation to activities concerned. It was actually issued by the Navy Ships' Store Office under date of July 23, 1947.

Some months later complaints began to be received from various jobbers who alleged that this directive was being violated by officials of the ships' service program through the issuance of contrary verbal instructions to the effect that those provisions which permitted local purchase without reference to the central office were to be disregarded. It was alleged, moreover, that a concerted campaign was being conducted by some officials in the program to compel the forwarding of orders to New York for approval prior to purchase, despite the provisions of the July directive which specifically stated that central-office approval was not required. Apparently as a result of complaints made directly to the Undersecretary of the Navy, Hon. W. John Kenney, in October 1947, a further directive, dated October 29, was issued, which restated the provisions in the July directive permitting local purchase and called particular attention to the fact that orders could be placed locally without prior approval by the district ships' service officer or the Navy Ships' Store Office.

Some months after the issuance of this latter directive, complaints were received by the committee to the effect that notwithstanding the existence of both directives continued pressure was being put upon individual stores by the central office to forward all purchase orders for unlisted [1] items to that office for prior approval.

During the early part of this year a number of complainants furnished the subcommittee chairman and staff member with information concerning specific instances of violations of the terms and spirit of the July and October directives. Several conferences were held with a number of potential witnesses who stated that they would be willing to testify under oath as to the violations concerning which they furnished information.

Although the pressure of important legislation and other matters before the full committee did not permit the scheduling of any hearings during the second session of the Eightieth Congress, a letter dated June 15, 1947, was addressed to the Secretary of the Navy by the subcommittee chairman after approval by a majority of the members of the subcommittee. Briefly, this letter set forth the fact that evidence of certain violations had been received and expressed the chairman's keen disappointment over the fact that the entire problem had not yet been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. In addition, the chairman advised the Secretary that the subcommittee had determined to conduct an investigation into the operation of the Navy ships' store office, with a view to determining whether there was any justification for the continued existence of that office and what action, legislative or otherwise, would be necessary to implement the policies laid down in the resolution transmitted to the Navy Department last year.

Investigation in Norfolk Area

For the purpose of obtaining information as to the effect of the operations of the Navy Ships' Store Office at local levels, two visits were made to Norfolk, Va., and the surrounding area, where conversations were had with the commandant of the Fifth Naval District, the Fifth Naval District supply officer, the district ships' service officer, and the ships' service officers and subordinate officials at three of the larger main ships' service stores and an equal number of branch stores. In addition, in nearly all instances, conferences were held with [1] Refers to items not previously approved for purchase by listing in catalogs issued by the Navy ships' store office and known as price agreement bulletins.

the commanding officers of the installations at which these stores are located. This area was considered particularly suitable for an inquiry at local levels due to the variety and number of naval activities concentrated in that immediate locality.

Immediately upon arrival in the Norfolk area, it became apparent that a definite line of cleavage exists between the views of many line officers on the one hand and officers of the Supply Corps on the other, regarding the desirability of the present centralized system. The majority—though by no means all—of the commanding officers contacted at activities within the Fifth Naval District, including the district commandant himself, were found to be unfavorably disposed toward the system as it now operates. Officers of the Supply Corps, on the other hand, were unanimously favorable in their comments. Indeed, the attitude manifested by the line officers tended at first blush to give the impression that widespread dissatisfaction with the system existed throughout all commands. However, upon further investigation it developed that while complaints on the part of commanding officers were widespread, many of the objections seemed to arise from a misunderstanding of the purposes and functions of the central office rather than as a result of any inherent fault in the system.

ATTITUDE OF COMMANDING OFFICERS TOWARD PROGRAM

Complaint that local profits must be shared with outside agencies under centralized program

The objections of the commanding officers are varied and numerous. Perhaps the most important is the complaint that a local store is required to pay over a substantial share of its profits to the Navy Ships' Store Office and to the Bureau of Naval Personnel central welfare and recreation fund. The contribution to the central office is fixed at 3 percent of gross sales per month while the amount payable to the Bureau of Naval Personnel is computed in the following manner: First, a store is entitled to retain for its own welfare fund a sum equal to $1.50 per man per month. This amount is calculated upon the basis of the average complement present during the period in question. All profits over and above this figure, excluding, of course, the sum payable to the Brooklyn Office, are divided between the Bureau of Naval Personnel and the local activity in the ratio of two-thirds to one-third.

The 3 percent of gross sales payable to the Navy Ships' Store Office is required in part to pay the administrative expenses of that Office and also to provide certain special reserves.

At one station it was asserted that the payment of 3 percent of gross sales to the central office represented approximately one-third of the profits realized by the store at that particular station. Were this payment not required, it was pointed out, the amount in question could be retained for welfare use at the home station or, on the other hand, if no additional funds were required for local welfare and recreation, the station could pass the benefits of these profits back to its patrons in the form of reduced prices and still retain the same amount of profit for local welfare use as it receives today.

These objections overlook several very important facts. First, only a small percentage of the 3 percent paid to the central office actually accounts for the expenses of that office itself. The bulk of this amount is used for various reserve funds which accrue to the benefit of individual stores, such as, for example, funds to be used for providing necessary replacements of equipment at stores. In addition, a large portion of the fund will now be used as a set-aside under a system of self-insurance, whereby the Navy will provide for adequate coverage of all insurance risks to which stores throughout the system may be subject and for which commercial contracts were previously obtained. It has been found that self-insurance will be more economical by far than insurance obtainable from private companies even upon the very best terms possible.

With regard to the complaint that an individual store must share its profits with other activities throughout the Navy by contributing to the Bureau of Naval Personnel central welfare fund, it is significant to note that the two main stores in the Norfolk area are located respectively at the receiving station, naval operating base; and at the naval air station, Norfolk. Both these activities are extremely large and important establishments with a large complement and with numerous dependents quartered either on the stations themselves or in the immediate locality. In addition, each has a large turn-over of transient personnel. It can readily be seen, therefore, that these two stores, with the large volume of business they enjoy, can reasonably be expected to conduct a far more profitable operation than a small isolated activity where the military population remains small and stable. Thus, there is certainly a great deal to say for the argument that large activities of this character should share their profits with those less fortunate. The position taken by the Navy Department is that all ships' service stores at all installations are merely a part of one and the same Navy.

Complaint that prices in stores are too high

Another major complaint by some commanding officers is that prices in ships' service stores are too high. The typical argument encountered in these quarters is that present prices are as high, higher, or almost as high as prices in civilian chain or department stores in the area. However, none of the officers interviewed furnished any specific instances of unfavorable price comparisons between the Navy stores on the one hand and local commercial retail outlets on the other. Moreover, the allegation that prices are as high as those in commercial outlets was vigorously denied by ships' service officers who pointed to the fact that inflation has naturally brought about a considerable rise in ships' service prices as well as all other prices, but that notwithstanding this fact, prices in the Navy stores are maintained at a lower level than those outside. Indeed, an investigation conducted by the commandant of the Fifth Naval District, who is admittedly critical of the program, disclosed that the present scale of prices in ships' service stores is lower than current prices outside.

Further findings by the commandant in the investigation referred to were that prices were higher than formerly, that much of the criticism regarding prices emanated from enlisted personnel and their dependents, and that ships' service stores were not being patronized to the extent they were under the old system of independent operation. On the basis of these findings, the commandant has concluded that ships' service stores today are failing to fulfill their primary mission of providing articles of necessity and convenience to enlisted personnel at the lowest possible cost.

Digitized by Google

As for the commandant's finding that prices are higher than formerly this situation is to be expected and is simply a reflection of current inflation in the over-all economy. Moreover, it is inevitable that the pressure of the rising cost of living will be felt most sharply by enlisted personnel since they are the lowest paid group in the service. Furthermore, it is believed that this would largely account for any loss of patronage in ships' service stores, as distinguished from commissaries, where foodstuffs and other items of prior necessity are sold.

Alleged conflict in missions due to high prices

One point, however, which has important policy implications is the conclusion which the commandant draws regarding fulfillment by the stores of their basic mission of providing goods to enlisted personnel at the lowest possible cost. Actually, this is only one of the stated missions of the program; the other mission is to provide a source of welfare funds from nonappropriated moneys. The commandant has suggested the thought that these two missions are mutually inconsistent and that neither can be accomplished except at the expense of the other. This argument is certainly valid from a strictly logical standpoint since it is obvious that lower prices would prevail if the welfare aspect were disregarded and operations were conducted on a wholly nonprofit basis. Over and against this must be considered the fact—and it is submitted that strict logic must be tempered accordingly—that a substantial reduction in prices would undoubtedly produce a storm of complaints from local retail enterprise far exceeding anything which has been heard to date. It would appear, therefore, as is always the case in the solution of military problems, that a workable balance or compromise has been achieved between conflicting forces and objectives.

Some commanding officers seemed to feel that the mere existence of the central office was proof in and of itself that prices are too high. How could it be otherwise, they ask, when one considers the "tremendous overhead" of that office and also the contribution made to the central welfare fund?

It is certainly true, of course, that sales prices of articles sold in ships' service stores are fixed by the Navy Ships' Store Office; and it is also true that these prices must be sufficiently high to provide for the required assessments payable to the central office and to the Bureau of Naval Personnel and also to provide at the same time funds for the home station's welfare and recreation program. On the other hand, none of the arguments by those who object to high prices take into account the economies in accounting, auditing, insurance, and procurement of merchandise which have resulted from the central operation.

The claim was made in several quarters that because prices are too high, sales have fallen off and as a result insufficient income is now being obtained for welfare and recreation. This argument, however, is entirely at variance with reports of profits shown in operating statements and it is significant to note that sufficient funds have now been accumulated out of profits throughout the entire system to permit the Navy to act as self-insurers in connection with all insurance risks incident to the operation of the ships' service program.

Complaint that control over sales prices should be restored to commanding officer

Throughout most of the arguments concerning alleged high prices and the draining off of profits to outside activities, one detects a very keen resentment on the part of commanding officers over the fact that they have been divested of the control which they formerly exercised over the operation of individual ships' service stores. One phase of this control under the old system was the commanding officer's power to regulate the prices charged in his ships' service store. Commanding officers regarded—and many still regard—this power as a necessarily inherent prerogative which goes hand in hand with a commanding officer's responsibility for the maintenance of morale at his station. Thus, under the old regime of independent operations, commanding officers often employed this power for morale purposes by reducing prices on cigarettes, haircuts, or other articles or services falling into the category of necessities, whenever profits in some other department were sufficiently high to permit a subsidy of this character.

While arguments for the restoration to the commanding officers of control over prices have considerable appeal on the surface, it was pointed out by ships' service officers that it is a thoroughly unsound practice from a business standpoint to allow any one department to run at a loss. This is true because the operating margins in certain departments, notably the laundry and canteen, are extremely narrow. These are typical departments in which control of prices by the commanding officer for morale purposes might be appropriate,yet—as one officer at the operating level pointed out—the laundry is generally the first department likely to show a deficit, while the operation of the canteen at a loss for only a few days can very easily outweigh profitable operations in all other departments, thus resulting in a net loss for the entire store. This is true because profitable operation of the canteen depends primarily upon volume since operating costs are extremely high, amounting to between 20 and 25 percent of gross sales exclusive of the cost of goods sold.

Other complaints by commanding officers

Some commanding officers expressed disapproval of the present system on the ground that supervision by the central office was productive of administrative arguments and consequent loss of time, which was alleged to arise mainly from the fact that the central office does not fully understand local problems. Conversations with local store officials disclosed little or no evidence in support of these allegations insofar as operations at the present time are concerned. However, it was very apparent that there has been a noteworthy change in the character of relations between local stores and the central office in recent months. This change was frankly attributed in the opinion of some local store officials to the assignment last summer of Rear Adm. A. A. Antrim (SC), United States Navy, as officer in charge of the Navy Ships' Store Office in Brooklyn. Local officials, in referring to improvements which have gradually taken place over a period of several months, did not hesitate to make it known that the present situation affords a sharp contrast with that which existed about a year ago. A number of these local store officials corroborated some of the charges which had previously been made to the committee with regard to operations in the latter half of 1947. With regard to operations at the present time, however, they made it clear that they now feel perfectly free to procure locally any merchandise for which they believe there is a demand. These officials also pointed out that there formerly existed considerable ill will at the local level because of the preemptory character of correspondence emanating from the central office. But this situation also, they stated, has definitely been corrected.

From the foregoing, it would appear that the complaints of some commanding officers about administrative arguments between local stores and the New York office are well founded insofar as they apply to the situation which prevailed about a year ago. However, it is believed that the basis of this complaint has largely been eliminated today.

Another view expressed at the local command level was that the centralized system was uneconomical on the ground that it cost more money in the long run to operate the entire system than would be the case if local stores were operated independently. However, this proposition was not stated as a fact but merely as a belief. No evidence was cited in support of this position, and it is extremely doubtful that the present advantages inherent in the centralized system, particularly in connection with accounting and the maintenance of necessary records, could be provided if each store were to operate as an individual entity.

Other complaints by commanding officers were as follows: That the New York office attempts to prescribe local merchandise policies; that it indulges in arguments with the stores as to types of merchandise which should be carried and also as to the quantities which ought to be carried; and, finally, that the central office itself purchases and ships certain items for the account of local stores.

First of all, it may be said that the New York office very definitely prescribes local merchandise policies to the extent that it requires that certain ratios of stock in inventory as against stock turn-over be maintained. The maintenance of these ratios is extremely important to the successful operation of any merchandising venture. Inventories of slow-moving merchandise cannot be permitted to accumulate but must be disposed of even though this may necessitate taking radical mark-downs. Moreover, if a store happens to be overstocked in a particular item, or even in a particular department, sound policy demands that that store be not permitted to increase stocks of such items until such time as these inventories are reduced to reasonable levels.

The New York office maintains a stock-control system, based on reports from the stores, from which it is possible to determine the current inventory position of any store and thus to determine its "open to buy" position. If a store's inventory position is such as to indicate that replenishments of a particular item are appropriate, it is said that that store has an "open to buy" position of a specified amount.

The New York office very definitely attempts to discourage the procurement by a store of merchandise in cases where such procurement would adversely affect a store's inventory position. When orders are placed locally, with copies only being sent to the central office, there is often no way in which that office can prevent the consummation of an individual purchase order before the purchase has become an accomplished fact. However, the central office will immediately take the matter up with the store and caution the store officer against overextending himself in the future. On the other hand, officials at the local store level as well as those in the central office stated categorically that no objection is made to the purchase of merchandise locally where the inventory position of the store is satisfactory and the ships' service officer deems the item a suitable one for resale.

As for the complaint that the New York office purchases and ships certain items to stores without any request having been made, inquiry disclosed that this is done only in the case of a few local stores known as sample stores, which have been so designated for the express purpose of testing sales appeal of trial merchandise.

Another complaint encountered in the Norfolk area related to qualifications of field personnel at the district level. This criticism had its basis in certain incompatible personality relationships which no longer exist and, therefore, can be disregarded in the present inquiry.

ATTITUDE OF LOCAL STORE OFFICIALS TOWARD PROGRAM

Ships' service officers and their civilian assistants at stores visited in the Norfolk area were found to be unanimous in their support of the present program. Even those individuals who were inclined to be critical of the central office freely admitted that their antagonism was a hold-over from a period several months or a year ago when they were continually subject to censure in their day-to-day operations by the New York office. All were agreed, however, that a marked improvement in relations had taken place in recent months and that operations are functioning very smoothly at the present time.

As has already been indicated, some of the local store officials attributed the change in conditions to the appointment of Admiral Antrim as officer in charge of the Navy Ships' Store Office. Others observed quite frankly that Admiral Antrim's appointment and the general improvement in the relationship between the stores and the central office may very well have taken place only because of the active interest shown by Subcommittee No. 6 in the operation of the program.

These officials expressed complete confidence in Admiral Antrim and voiced the expectation that conditions would steadily improve under his administration. Some of them ventured so far as to express the hope, however, that these changes for the better would prove to be enduring in the distant future after Admiral Antrim has left the program and after the committee's attention has ceased to be focused upon this particular problem.

ADVANTAGES OF CENTRALIZED OPERATION

Local store officials unanimously expressed the hope that the committee would take no action which would result in a return to the old system of operations. Even those who were unsparing in their criticism of certain aspects of the central program as it has operated at various periods in the past were emphatic in calling attention to the following benefits which have resulted from the centralized operation:

1. Responsibility for the operation of stores has been lifted from the shoulders of commanding officers who by training are hardly equipped to operate a mercantile enterprise and has been placed where it belongs—upon the Supply Corps.

Digitized by Google

2. Commanding officers have been relieved of the burden of financial responsibility which they formerly sustained in the event of defalcations on the part of those whom they designated as ships' service officers.

3. The establishment of clear-cut procedures and lines of responsibility, together with regular methods of reporting accounting information and other operating data, has resulted not only in sounder, more businesslike operations, but it has also thrown protections around ships' service officers themselves which they did not enjoy under the old system. It has largely eliminated opportunities for venality and corruption, thereby removing temptations in this direction, and has provided safeguards for the local store officer against the more serious consequences of his own errors of judgment. Indeed, so essential are these safeguards deemed to be for the protection of an officer's career, that several of the ships' service officers who were interviewed declared that they would seek to be detached from the program immediately if these safeguards were removed.

4. Advice furnished by the central office as to available merchandise and appraisals thereof as to price and quality are an invaluable aid to local store officials because they furnish a guide or standard of reference against which to compare offerings in the local market. This is true not only of the price-agreement bulletins which list items available under Nation-wide open-end contracts entered into by the Navy Ships' Store Office for the benefit of local stores, but is also true of the flash bulletins periodically issued by the central office. Moreover, local store officers say that they appreciate being able to obtain the advice of experienced buyers regarding new or untried articles as to whose salability they themselves may entertain some uncertainty.

Despite hostility on the part of some of the commanding officers, the commanding officers contacted agreed without exception that it was a very fine thing that commanding officers had been relieved of the financial responsibility incident to the operation of the stores. Indeed, it has been discreetly suggested that the commanding officers were only too happy to be relieved of the burdens incident to operation of the stores but at the same time were loath to surrender the accompanying authority and prerogatives which they had formerly enjoyed in connection with these operations. A notable exception was the commanding officer of one of the larger activities in the Fifth Naval District who expressed himself as thoroughly satisfied with the present system, first, because it has relieved him of financial responsibility and, secondly, because he does not feel that a commanding officer's time should be taken up with day-to-day surveillance over the routine operations of a merchandising activity. Recognizing the fact that authority and responsibility must go hand in hand, he stated that he was very glad to have his store operated under the supervision of the Navy Ships' Store Office and that it was sufficient from his point of view if he were merely kept advised in a general way as to the manner in which the store was being operated.

EVIDENCE BEARING ON ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF DIRECTIVES SETTING FORTH POLICIES PREVIOUSLY DECLARED BY THE SUBCOMMITTEE

Information received from ships' service officers and other local store officials in the Norfolk area tended to corroborate evidence heretofore received by the committee to the effect that some officials in the program had issued verbal instructions which were in conflict with the provisions permitting local purchases which were contained in the July 1947 directive. In each instance the official who issued the contrary verbal instructions was credited with having made the observation at the time that the directive was merely the result of "political pressure" and hence was to be disregarded. However, all of the instances referred to took place a year or more ago, and no evidence whatsoever was obtained tending to indicate recurrences of such violations within the last 12 months.

EXTENT OF LOCAL PURCHASES TODAY

Ships' service officers and subordinate officials at stores in the Fifth Naval District stated categorically that they now feel perfectly free to make purchases locally without fear of repercussions from the New York office, provided, of course, that their inventory position justifies such purchases and that the merchandise in question is an item which is authorized for resale in Navy stores. By way of illustration, one officer cited the fact that 75 to 80 percent of all appliances and 90 percent of all jewelry sold by his store were purchased locally.

These officers without exception stated that all suppliers, regardless of trade level, are welcome and can do business with their stores provided they are able to compete with others on the basis of price, quality, and availability. In this connection it was ascertained that many articles currently carried in stock in ships' service stores in the Norfolk area are regularly procured through some of the distributors who have complained concerning the centralized operation.

INVESTIGATION AT THE CENTRAL OFFICE LEVEL

Following the visits made to local activities in the Norfolk area, the current inquiry was continued at the central office level by a visit to the Navy Ships' Store Office in Brooklyn, N. Y.

Particular attention was devoted during this phase of the investigation to the following questions:

1. Does the central office actually exercise ultimate control over the selection of merchandise stocked by the stores?
2. To what extent, if any, does the central office attempt to prevent the procurement of merchandise which a local officer considers desirable but which it disapproves of on grounds of price or quality?
3. What is the precise nature of the merchandising functions performed by the buyers in the New York office?

First of all, it should be borne in mind that the entire dispute over the procurement of merchandise locally has revolved around the procurement of so-called "unlisted items"; that is, items which are not listed in price-agreement bulletins issued by the Navy Ships' Store Office. Items which are so listed have, of course, been previously approved by the central office, inasmuch as they are covered by contracts entered into by that office with suppliers.

Accordingly, the first step in the New York investigation was an attempt to determine the extent to which orders for unlisted items are channeled to the New York office prior to the consummation of purchases. This refers, of course, to the transmittal of the original purchase order, as distinguished from the mere copies forwarded to the central office for administrative review after the fact.

By the terms of the July and October 1947 directives, there is no requirement whatsoever that local purchase orders be submitted for central office confirmation or review prior to completion of a purchase. Officials in the New York office stated categorically that no attempt whatsoever is made to induce local store officers into sending such orders to New York. However, they point out that there is nothing to prevent the local officer from referring an order to New York for prior advice in cases where he is not certain whether the item is a desirable one from the standpoint of price, quality, or other factors. In these cases, it is considered that no order has been originated by the local store inasmuch as the ship's service officer has, in effect, delegated the initiation of the purchase order to the central office.

As to the question whether pressure is exerted upon the local stores to compel them to forward orders for unlisted items to New York, the investigation disclosed that only about 5 percent of the total number of orders for unlisted merchandise is forwarded to that office. This figure is merely an estimate, as no exact statistics on this point are maintained. However, this estimate was confirmed by several sources in the central office.

It was further ascertained that out of the 5 percent thus forwarded to the central office, very few purchase orders are changed in any way, the majority being approved without alteration and forwarded directly to the supplier by the Navy Ships' Store Office. In those few instances where some of the items in a purchase order are disapproved, this action is taken for one or more of the following reasons:

1. The central office knows that the particular item is currently unavailable from the source specified in the order.
2. The item is overpriced.
3. The item is unauthorized.
4. An unbalanced stock condition exists.
5. The item is an undesirable one, (a) from the standpoint of good taste—although not necessarily unauthorized, or (b) because it is known from previous experience to be a poor seller.

In this connection, Admiral Antrim stated that he personally reviews all instances where an item is crossed off a purchase order.

All of the above information leads to the conclusion that the answers to the first two questions pursued in the New York inquiry are:

1. That the central office does not exercise restrictive ultimate control over the selection of merchandise stocked by the stores; and
2. That it prevents the procurement of merchandise desired by a local store only in a very few instances and then only for obviously sufficient business reasons.

In an effort to ascertain the precise nature of the merchandising functions performed by the New York office considerable attention was given to the question how selections of merchandise are made by the buyers. It was ascertained, for example, that costume jewelry was selected in the following way:

Costume jewelry, according to the custom of the trade, is a strictly seasonal item. Two new lines are offered annually, one in the spring and the other in the fall. New lines customarily make their first appearance on the market at a jewelry show at which most manufacturers and many jobbers and distributors exhibit their wares.

Digitized by Google

It is one of the duties of the jewelry buyer at the Navy Ships' Store Office to attend shows of this type and to examine anywhere from 150 to 200 different lines of merchandise, comparing them as to price and quality. From all the merchandise examined, the buyer selects several lines which he or she considers the best-made, best-priced, and best-styled offerings in each given category.

Samples of these are hand picked by the buyer and are segregated and grouped according to lines. Each group is then presented by the buyer to the merchandise council, a three-man committee whose membership comprises the senior civilian employee of the Navy Ships' Store Office, Mr. Joseph Emma, and two of his principal assistants. The council compares the various lines previously selected by the buyer in each group and makes a determination as to which of these items should be listed in the price-agreement bulletins.

In addition to the merchandise which may be selected at the jewelry shows, examination is made from time to time of samples offered by salesmen who contact the central office. Such merchandise is evaluated in the same manner.

A number of interesting facts were brought to light in connection with the procurement of watches for resale in Navy ships' service stores. From a merchandising standpoint watches fall into two categories; namely, "dress" watches and "military" watches. The first group consists of the well-known brand names, and experience has demonstrated that these types are purchased by the customer entirely on the basis of a brand name made popular by extensive advertising, with little or no attention being paid to quality. Military watches, on the other hand, sell because of the fact that they are military watches and also upon the basis of price. The manufacturer's name usually passes unnoticed by the customer. Because of the difference in approach by the buying public, it is necessary to follow entirely different procedures in the purchase of these two items. Thus, well-known brands are procured wherever they may be obtained most cheaply and without the need for any evaluation as to quality. Military watches, on the other hand, are carefully examined by experienced watchmakers to determine whether genuine movements of good quality are contained in the cases. Moreover, tests are made to determine whether the cases themselves are waterproof and whether they are made of stainless steel and otherwise of good quality. In this connection, it was stated that a number of watchcases on the market are made of bronze with an imitation stainless steel or chromium finish. Such materials are unsuitable because they are subject to corrosion by salt air.

In the case of well-known brands, it is the policy of certain watch manufacturers to sell only to certain specified jobbers. In addition, some of these manufacturers require that their jobbers absorb stated quotas periodically and will terminate or reduce the allocation of watches to a particular jobber in the event that he fails to keep his inventory moving. It has, therefore, become the practice of some jobbers, in order to avoid embarrassment with the manufacturers, to sell their overstocked inventories at a sacrifice, if necessary, to any outside distributor who will take the merchandise off their hands. As a result, distributors outside the manufacturer's normal trade channels are often able to offer the same watches at a considerably lower mark-up than that at which they are offered to the ships' service stores by the regular jobbers who normally handle these lines. Thus, although the jobbers may add a 30-percent mark-up to the manufacturer's cost, it is often possible for the Navy ships' service stores to obtain the same brands at a mark-up of only 10 percent.

This situation has naturally caused considerable resentment on the part of certain of the regular jobbers. They contend that many of the distributors offering merchandise at these lower mark-ups are financially irresponsible, and they have furnished evidence to the effect that at least one of these distributors does not even maintain an office and is unknown to Dun & Bradstreet. The Navy Ships' Store Office, on the other hand, takes the position that merchandise should be obtained at the lowest prices at which it is available, and that any complaints arising from this situation ought not to be directed at the Navy Ships' Store Office but should be taken up by the jobbers with their own suppliers—namely, the manufacturers—on the ground that they are failing properly to police their own distribution system.

The jewelry buyer stated categorically that local stores may sell any item for which there is a local demand, and that this is true even in the case of items for which there is no general demand throughout the country. The example was cited of a California concern which manufactures copper jewelry. No demand exists in the East for this type of merchandise but a substantial demand does exist in the West. In view of this regional demand, local stores in western areas are permitted to stock copper jewelry items.

The question was raised whether the central office ever procures or furnishes merchandise to local stores without any request having been made for such merchandise. It was stated categorically that the only time when jewelry is procured and furnished to a store without its request is in the case of a few stores scattered throughout the country which are designated as "sample stores." It is the practice to procure trial merchandise in small quantities and to furnish it to these stores for the purpose of obtaining sales experience. However, such articles are clearly designated as samples and the central office assumes responsibility for the success or failure of efforts to sell them.

The jewelry buyer expressed the opinion that jewelry items carried in the stores today are far superior to those available under the old system. The example was cited of one store which still has a large inventory of jewelry items which have been in stock ever since the time of take-over 2 years ago. A large portion of this merchandise is gold-filled jewelry, which the stores have had poor experience with in the past due to the fact that it changes color. Notwithstanding this fact, however, the jewelry buyer at the Navy Ships' Store Office emphasized the fact that even items of this type may be stocked by a store if the ships' service officer finds that there is a local demand. In that event, the central office has no authority to prevent the stocking of such merchandise and no attempts in this direction are ever made under the procedures in effect at the present time.

The question was raised whether it is ever the practice of the central office to request local stores to furnish a list of their requirements for jewelry items. A negative answer was received insofar as all jewelry items are concerned, with the single exception of military watches. It is necessary to ask the stores to list their requirements for this type of watch due to the extreme scarcity of military watches and also because of the fact that orders for the movements for these watches must be placed in Switzerland about 1 year in advance of delivery.

Digitized by Google

The jewelry buyer expressed the opinion that merchandise listed in the price-agreement bulletins has improved steadily, and that it is better today than ever before. She also pointed out that every effort had been made to assure an equitable representation for all buyers listed. This has been done by allocating the same number of pages in the bulletins to each manufacturer or other supplier listed. Whereas formerly one concern might have had five or six lines listed and another firm only one line, all suppliers now have approximately the same number of listings.

Conclusions

In view of all the above, the inescapable conclusion is reached that today the Navy's ships' service system is operating in a generally satisfactory manner. It is also equally obvious that the conditions today are a vast improvement over the inflexible, unjust, and overcentralized system which obtained a year or more ago, a change for which the efforts of Subcommittee No. 6 may be considered largely responsible. Today, the local ships' service store is free to make local purchases which are consonant with good business practices, yet it enjoys the advantages of centralized accounting, centralized procurement where it is advantageous, centralized inventory control, centralized insurance, and the over-all supervision of merchandising experts.

One sure indication of the improved situation lies in the fact that local jobbers and wholesalers, who complained loudly during the year 1947 that they were unable to do business with the Navy, have now reduced their complaints to a relatively low whisper. While they will not admit that the situation has been altered to their complete satisfaction, it is obvious that these small-business men are again able to carry on, as they had not been able to during the period of overcentralization.

A subsidiary conclusion is that a change in the personnel at the Navy Ships' Store Office has had a great deal to do with smoothening the troubled waters. Greater familiarity with the new system, and greater understanding of its intent, at both central office and local levels has also contributed to the improvement.

Recommendations

1. That no fundamental changes be made in the current organization and procedures of the Navy Ships' Store Office.
2. That the operations of that office be kept under general surveillance by the Committee on Armed Services during the Eighty-first Congress to insure that the present situation does not deteriorate at some future date.
3. That the committee consider the desirability of a comprehensive inquiry into the following question which was beyond the scope of the present investigation, viz., the desirability of a merger—or a unification of procedures short of merger—of the Navy Ships' Store Office with the Army and Air Force Exchange Service.

Respectfully submitted.

[No. 4]

TO AUTHORIZE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A JOINT LONG-RANGE PROVING GROUND FOR GUIDED MISSILES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 1741). MR. BROOKS

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, Jan. 14, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Secretary of the Air Force recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Air Force.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, January 7, 1949.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes, which the Department of the Air Force recommends be enacted into law. The Secretary of Defense has assigned responsibility for the preparation and submission of this measure, on behalf of the National Military Establishment, to this Department. This proposed measure is similar to S. 2761, introduced in the second session of the Eightieth Congress.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to provide substantive law authorizing the Secretary of the Air Force to acquire, construct, and equip a joint long-range proving ground. This proving ground is required primarily for the development and testing of guided missiles of ranges greater than 150 miles, and for subsequent training of personnel. The proposed bill, upon enactment, will serve as a basis for requesting appropriations for the establishment of such joint long-range proving ground and for such additional bases and ranges as may be later determined to be necessary.

The field of guided missiles is still within its infancy. Certain other nations have availed themselves of the services of German scientists and technicians and are making vigorous efforts to produce guided missiles of intercontinental ranges. It will not suffice for the United States to merely keep abreast of or equal the efforts of other nations; but, in order that this Nation may survive, it will be necessary for the United States to take the lead in this new field. Accordingly, there is an immediate and urgent necessity for acquiring, constructing, and equipping a land-based proving ground where guided missiles, now under development and scheduled for tests in the near future, can be flight tested at long ranges.

The entire question of a guided-missile proving ground where missiles with ranges in excess of 150 miles could be tested was referred by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Joint Research and Development Board upon the establishment of that Board in July 1946. A committee, in which all three services had equal representation, was formed on October 7, 1946, with the specific objective of "examining the entire question of a single, national, long-range guided-missile proving ground." This committee submitted a report to the Joint Research and Development Board on June 20, 1947, recommending the immediate establishment of a joint long-range proving ground and, as a result of the recommendation, the Board, in letters addressed to the Secretaries of War and Navy, approved the establishment of a long-range proving ground for guided missiles and allocated the responsibility for acquiring, building, and equipping the range to the War Department.

Since the enactment of the National Security Act of 1947 the responsibility has been reassigned to the Department of the Air Force. A joint executive group, embodying equal participation by the Army, Navy, and Air Force, has been established to pursue the project.

In order to meet the requirements of the guided-missile programs of the three armed services, it is essential that this range be in operation at the earliest possible date. The Department of the Army and the Department of the Navy join with the Department of the Air Force in urgently recommending the enactment of this legislation.

This proposed bill has been coordinated among the departments and boards in the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The fiscal effect of the proposed legislation is manifest in that there is authorized the expenditure of not more than $200,000,000 to carry out the purposes of this act.

The Bureau of the Budget has been consulted and advises that there is no objection to the submission of the proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely,

W. STUART SYMINGTON.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to amend section 19 of the act of August 13, 1946, (60 Stat. 1057), so as to remove the upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to remove the present 25-year upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy.

Under present circumstances the existing maximum age limit has become unduly restrictive. Many of the recent college graduates and those who will graduate within the next several years are veterans. Their ages are well above the prewar average and in many cases they are, therefore, ineligible for appointment in the Supply Corps under existing law. The 25-year age restriction also prevents the appointment of some Naval Academy graduates who, upon graduation, may not be physically qualified as line officers.

A further reason for amending the present section 19 arises out of its inconsistency with other statutory provisions. While the act of August 13, 1946, pertains to the procurement of officers from civilian sources, and section 19 would be construed as a restriction on that source only, section 6 of the act of July 22, 1935 (49 Stat. 487), and section 404 of the act of August 7, 1947 (61 Stat. 795), which pertain to appointments from personnel already in the Navy, contain no similar limitation. The 1935 act, authorizing transfers of line officers to the various staff corps, expressly provides that such transfers may be made regardless of age. The 1947 act, in its provisions for limited-duty officers to be appointed from warrant and enlisted grades, requires a minimum of 10 years' service in the Navy but sets no limitation as to age. While these two acts do not conflict with section 19 of the act of August 13, 1946, the latter is inconsistent with them for it results in different age requirements for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps depending upon the source of the appointment.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment and accordingly recommends its enactment.

This report has been coordinated within the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Department of the Navy has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

[No. 6]

TO PREVENT RETROACTIVE CHECKAGE OF PAYMENTS ERRONEOUSLY MADE TO CERTAIN RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL RESERVE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 1761). MR. KILDAY

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to prevent retroactive checkage of payments erroneously made to certain retired officers of the Naval Reserve, and for other purposes.

The proposed legislation has a dual purpose. The primary purpose is to prevent checkage of payments made to certain officers of the Naval Reserve supposedly as retirement pay. The secondary purpose is to permit officers of the Naval Reserve, heretofore or hereafter placed on the honorary retired list, to avail themselves of the retirement benefits of sections 6 and 7 of the act approved February 21, 1946 (60 Stat. 27; 34 U. S. C. 410 (b) and 410 (c)), if they meet the service requirements specified therein.

The officers who would be affected by the primary purpose of the proposed bill were placed on or transferred to the honorary retired list of the Naval Reserve, without pay, prior to World War II under the provisions of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, as amended (34 U. S. C. 855h). They subsequently served on active duty through the war, thereby acquiring sufficient active-duty credit to complete more than 20 years of active service. Accordingly, the retirement status of each was modified pursuant to section 6 of the act of February 21, 1946, and payments made as retirement pay pursuant to section 7 of said act. Said sections 6 and 7 read in part as follows:

SEC. 6. When any officer of the Regular Navy or * * * the Reserve components thereof has completed more than twenty years of active service * * * at least ten years of which shall have been active commissioned service, he may at any time thereafter * * * be placed upon the retired list on the first day of such month as the President may designate.

SEC. 7. (a) Each officer retired pursuant to the foregoing sections * * * shall be placed on the retired list with the highest rank * * * held by him while on active duty * * *. Officers retired pursuant to the foregoing sections * * * shall receive retired pay at the rate of 2½ per centum of the active-duty pay with longevity credit of the rank with which retired, multiplied by the number of years of service for which entitled to credit in the computation of their pay while on active duty, not to exceed a total of 75 per centum of said active-duty pay * * *.

It was considered at the time that although they had been previously placed on the honorary retired list, this fact would not be a legal obstacle to their "reretirement" with pay under the aforementioned act of February 21, 1946; hence, upon their own applications, they were placed on the retired list with pay.

In a decision dated May 6, 1947 (B–63359), the Comptroller General of the United States held that the action taken in the cases of these officers was not permitted by law; that they were not considered as being included within the provisions of section 6; and that they were not entitled to retirement, with pay, thereunder. These officers are, therefore, subject to checkage for all amounts they received supposedly as retirement pay.

The General Accounting Office has agreed to withhold checkage action pending initiation by the Navy Department of remedial legislation. The number of officers so involved is very small (three living and one deceased), but it is felt that since the reretirement of these officers was attempted in good faith and they accepted payments believed to be legal, such action should be validated. The total amount of checkage involved in the case of the above-mentioned four officers is $15,778.47. It is believed that the number of officers who will benefit from the secondary purpose of the proposed legislation will be very small.

The Navy Department recommends enactment of the proposed legislation.

An identical report has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives this date.

The Departments of the Army and Air Force have no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

TO AUTHORIZE THE ADVANCE ON THE RETIRED LIST OF LT. JOHN T. McDERMOTT, UNITED STATES NAVY (RETIRED), TO THE GRADE OF LIEUTENANT COMMANDER (H. R. 1793). MR. COLE OF NEW YORK

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to authorize the advance on the retired list of Lt. John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), to the grade of lieutenant commander.

Lieutenant McDermott entered the Naval Academy as a midshipman on May 31, 1916, and was commissioned as an ensign on June 7, 1919. He served on the active list of the Navy successively in the grades of ensign, lieutenant (junior grade), and lieutenant until June 30, 1941, on which date he was transferred to the retired list pursuant to section 12 (k) of the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 950), as amended by the act of October 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 1174, 1175), by reason of having twice failed of selection as lieutenant commander. On that same date he was advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander with retired pay of that grade in accordance with the second proviso of the said section 13 (k), as interpreted by the Navy Department, which provides:

> That lieutenants who served in the Navy or Naval Reserve Force prior to November 12, 1918, and who shall have completed not less than twenty-one years of service, and who subsequent to June 23, 1938, have been or shall hereafter be retired under any provision of law, shall be advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander on the retired list, effective from date of retirement with the retired pay of that grade.

The Assistant Comptroller General, however, has held (B–61756, dated January 8, 1947) that a lieutenant of the Navy whose only service prior to November 12, 1918, was that of a midshipman at the Naval Academy may not be regarded as having served in the Navy or Naval Reserve Force prior to November 12, 1918, within the meaning of the said section 12 (k). Although the said section 12 (k) was specifically repealed by section 436 (g) of the act of August 7, 1947 (Public Law 381, 80th Cong.), such repeal is not pertinent in view of said Assistant Comptroller General's decision that section 12 (k) does not apply to Lieutenant McDermott.

As a result of the Assistant Comptroller General's decision that Lieutenant McDermott's advancement to the grade of lieutenant commander was erroneous and that his status on the retired list is that of a lieutenant, this officer now finds himself indebted to the Government in the amount of approximately $2,300. The Navy Department considers that checkage of the retired pay of this officer to satisfy such an indebtedness would be unjust.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to legalize the action of the Navy Department in advancing Lieutenant McDermott to the grade of lieutenant commander and remove the necessity for checkage of his retired pay.

The Navy Department, accordingly, recommends enactment of the proposed legislation.

It is estimated that enactment of the proposed legislation will result in a cost of approximately $2,300 to the Government.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

(S) W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Enclosure.

A BILL To authorize the advance on the retired list of Lieutenant John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), to the grade of lieutenant commander

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, Lieutenant John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), shall be advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander on the retired list effective for all purposes from the date of his retirement.

RELATING TO THE PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT APPOINTED TO PERMANENT GRADES (H. R. 2425). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, January 26, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Navy recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "Relating to the pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Establishment appointed to permanent grades."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the establishment has been placed in the Department of the Navy.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill relating to the pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Establishment appointed to permanent grades.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to enable the Navy Department to effect an equitable adjustment of lineal precedence for officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the Reserve components thereof, in the issuance of permanent appointments, without giving rise to claims for back pay and allowances in certain cases.

The act of June 30, 1942 (56 Stat. 463), suspended the provisions of law relating to the permanent promotion of naval officers; after June 30, 1942, and until the enactment of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947, promotions and advancements effected were of a temporary, as distinguished from permanent, nature. The said Officer Personnel Act (sec. 426 (a)). repealed the suspending provisions of the June 30, act, and, by section 304 (a) thereof, required that "As soon as practicable, but not later than thirty days after the date of approval of this Act, the Secretary of the Navy shall establish a single lineal list of all officers of the grade of ensign and above of * * * the Navy or Naval Reserve on active duty on the date of establishment of such list, and such lineal list shall constitute the order of seniority of such officers as of the date of its establishment * * *."

Officers of the Naval Reserve ordered to active duty in connection with the Naval Reserve program or ordered to temporary active duty for the purpose of prosecuting special work are specifically excluded from the provisions of the Officer Personnel Act; Naval Reserve officers on inactive duty and those who, prior to the establishment of the lineal list, were under orders directing their release from active duty, were also excluded.

Officers falling within the provisions of the said Officer Personnel Act were recently issued permanent appointments (pursuant to the act). In many cases, for the purpose of adjusting lineal precedence incident to the transition from the temporary to permanent ranks, their dates of permanent appointments antedated their former temporary appointments in the same grades. It was not intended that officers in this category would be given back pay or allowances. In the case of Reserve officers excluded from the provisions of the act, claims may lie for back pay and allowances by virtue of section 312 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, as amended, which reads in part as follows:

"SEC. 312. * * * all officers of the Naval Reserve * * * who may be advanced to a higher grade or rank in time of peace or in time of war or national emergency under the provisions of this Act, shall be allowed the pay and allowances of the higher grade or rank from the dates of rank as stated in their commission, as distinguished from the dates of commission, or dates of acceptance of commission, and the dates of rank as stated in their commissions shall be conclusive for all purposes * * *." [Italics supplied.]

The Navy Department believes that enactment of the proposed legislation is necessary to forestall possible claims for back pay and allowances which may arise from the issuance of permanent appointments incident to the transition from temporary to permanent grades. It is estimated that such potential claims would total a sum upward of $30,000,000.

The Navy Department recommends enactment of the proposed legislation.

This report has been coordinated among the Departments and boards in the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

RELATING TO THE PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL RESERVE PERFORMING ACTIVE DUTY IN THE GRADE OF REAR ADMIRAL (H. R. 2426). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 19, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill relating to the pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve performing active duty in the grade of rear admiral, and for other purposes.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to remove an inadvertent discrimination now existing between rear admirals of the Naval Reserve and rear admirals of the Regular Navy in the matter of upper-half pay and allowances.

Under section 7 of the Naval Personnel Act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1005), rear admirals on the active list of the line of the Navy were divided for pay purposes into the upper half and the lower half; those officers embraced in the lower half of the grade numerically were given the pay and allowances authorized for brigadier generals of the Army; and those of the upper half, the pay and allowances of a major general of the Army. That division of rear admirals on the active list was continued in effect by subsequent acts including section 7 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, as amended (37 U. S. C. 107), which section uses in part the following language:

SEC. 7. The annual base pay of a brigadier general * * * or * * * rear admiral (lower half) of the Navy * * * shall be $6,600; and the annual base pay of a major general * * * or * * * rear admiral (upper half) of the Navy * * * shall be $8,800 * * *. [Italics supplied.]

Section 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, as amended, provides in part as follows:

SEC. 14. Officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Reserve forces of any of the services mentioned in the title of this Act, when on active duty in the service of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the same pay and allowances as are authorized for persons of corresponding grade and length of service in the Regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or Public Health Service.

Section 2 of the act of June 30, 1942 (56 Stat. 464, 50 U. S. C. 807), dealt with the advancement of rear admirals to the upper half of that grade and provided in part as follows:

SEC. 2. The number of rear admirals on the active list of the line entitled to the pay and allowances provided by law for rear admirals of the upper half, exclusive of those carried as additional numbers in such grade, shall be one-half of the number of permanent and temporary officers of the line in that grade * * *.

Digitized by Google

At the request of the Navy Department, the Comptroller General of the United States considered the question of upper-half pay for rear admirals of the Naval Reserve. His decision of September 10, 1946 (B–57583), held that section 2 of the above-mentioned act of June 30, 1942, referred to rear admirals on the active list of the line of the Navy and that the term "active list," with reference to the Navy, generally was used to denote officers of the Regular Navy as distinguished from officers of the Naval Reserve and officers on the retired list. It was further held, that while an officer of the Naval Reserve appointed to the grade or rank of rear admiral is entitled, when on active duty, to the same pay and allowances authorized for officers of corresponding grade and length of service in the Regular Navy (pursuant to sec. 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942), the matter of determining whether such officer is entitled to receive the pay of the upper half is dependent, not upon his length of service, but rather upon his numerical standing on the list of rear admirals of the line on the active list. The Comptroller determined that Reserve officers promoted to the grade of rear admiral do not thereby become entitled to have their names placed on the list of rear admirals of the line on the active list; hence, such officers are not entitled to receive the pay and allowances of the upper half as such pay is specifically authorized only for officers on the active list of the line of the Navy. The Comptroller General concluded that in the absence of a statute specifically so providing, his office—would not be justified in viewing the provision in section 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, supra, as authorizing credit of active upper half pay to officers promoted * * * to the rank of rear admiral in the Naval Reserve.

The proposed bill is designed to remove the unjust discrimination against Reserve rear admirals whose names are not on either of the lineal lists established under title III of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947. Reserve rear admirals whose names are placed on a lineal list will be entitled to receive upper-half pay, when appropriate, pursuant to the provisions of the Officer Personnel Act (secs. 311 (d) (14) and 315). The proposed legislation is not retroactive.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this measure on behalf of the National Military Establishment, and accordingly recommends its enactment.

This report has been coordinated within the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

AUTHORIZING THE DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN LOST, ABANDONED, OR UNCLAIMED PERSONAL PROPERTY COMING INTO THE POSSESSION OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THE DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, THE DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, OR THE DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE (H. R. 2434). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, January 19, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Secretary of the Army recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property coming into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Army.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property coming into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes, which the Department of the Army recommends be enacted into law. The Secretary of Defense has assigned responsibility for the preparation and submission of this measure, on behalf of the National Military Establishment, to this Department.

The purpose of the proposed bill is to provide authority for the disposition of baggage and similar articles of personal effects shipped on Government bills of lading, after an unsuccessful effort has been made to determine the owner thereof. If the owner is determined but not located, the property is not to be disposed of until the expiration of 90 days after written notice has been sent to his last known address. The bill further provides that the proceeds of the sale of such property shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Disposition of such articles or effects as provided in the proposed bill will permit a much more advantageous use by the afore-mentioned Departments of storage space in certain of their warehouses and depots. The Department of the Army, therefore, recommends enactment of this legislation.

The proposed legislation, if enacted, would result in no additional cost to the Government.

This report has been coordinated among the Departments and boards in the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Bureau of the Budget has been consulted, and advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

KENNETH C. ROYALL,
Secretary of the Army.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN PERSONNEL AND FORMER PERSONNEL OF THE NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT TO ACCEPT CERTAIN GIFTS AND A FOREIGN DECORATION TENDERED BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS (H. R. 2476). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 14, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to authorize certain personnel and former personnel of the Naval Establishment to accept certain gifts and a foreign decoration tendered by foreign governments.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is explained in its title.

The acceptance of gifts from foreign states by persons holding an office of trust or profit under the United States is controlled by article I, section 9, clause 8, of the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

> No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any Present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

The Navy Department has interpreted this clause to mean that enlisted men are officers within the purview of this provision and that personnel having any connection with the Navy, including active, inactive, or retired individuals, are also in this category.

At the present time certain gifts and a decoration from foreign nations to personnel of the Naval Establishment are being withheld pending appropriate legislation.

The gifts include a barometer, gold watches, pieces of plate, and cigarette cases awarded naval personnel at various times since 1935. While the reason for giving three of these presents is unknown, the others are tokens of appreciation, such as those items the Danish government presented to two Naval officers for training Danish personnel at the naval air station, Jacksonville, Fla. The Icelandic Government gave 10 awards for aid to the Icelandic motor vessel Lagarfoss, January 10, 1944, when a Navy invasion boat rescued the passengers and crew of that vessel when she was stranded by night off Reykjavik during a severe snowstorm.

Prince Saud of the Saudi Arabian Government has presented gifts to various officers and enlisted men of a naval task force recently in Mediterranean waters. These gifts are in keeping with the precedent created by similar gifts to the navies of other countries.

The foreign decoration, the acceptance of which would be authorized by the proposed legislation, is the King's Medal for Service in the Cause of Freedom awarded by the British Government to Dr. Mina S. Rees, now head of the Mathematics Branch of the Office of Naval Research, Navy Department, for her contributions in the field of mathematical research during World War II.

Digitized by Google

The gifts and the decoration are at present in the custody of the State Department pending congressional approval for their acceptance.

The proposed legislation would further authorize the award of the Cross of Naval Merit by Peru and two awards of the Order of Naval Merit and Diploma by Brazil.

The enactment of this proposed legislation would result in no cost to the Government.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment and accordingly recommends its enactment.

An identical report has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives this date.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE FULL COMMITTEE ON THE BILL TO AUTHORIZE THE COMPOSITION OF THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE AIR FORCE OF THE UNITED STATES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 1437). MR. VINSON

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Thursday, January 27, 1949.

The committee met at 10 o'clock, the Honorable Carl Vinson (chairman), presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

The purpose of the committee meeting this morning is to consider H. R. 1437.

(H. R. 1437 is as follows:)

[H. R. 1437, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To authorize the composition of the Army of the United States and the Air Force of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. That this Act may be cited as the "Army and Air Force of 1949".

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. In enacting this legislation, it is the intent of Congress to provide an Army of the United States and an Air Force of the United States capable, in conjunction with the other armed services, of preserving the peace, security, and providing for the defense of the United States, its Territories, possessions, and occupied areas wherever located, of supporting the national policies, of implementing the national objectives, and of overcoming any nations responsible for aggressive acts imperiling the peace and security of the United States.

TITLE I—ARMY

AUTHORIZED COMPOSITION

SEC. 101. The United States Army and the supplemental Reserve components of the Army of the United States are authorized to consist of the required number of organizational units, with their necessary supporting elements, including combat, administrative, logistic, transport, training, and other service support, needed to maintain the minimum requirements of the Army for national security: Provided, That the authorized strength of the organizational units of the United States Army shall consist of twelve Regular Army divisions and five separate Regular Army combat teams and supporting combat and service units supplemented by such forces of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States as may be required to accomplish the mission of the Army, including twenty-seven divisions and twenty-one regimental combat teams of the National Guard and twenty-five divisions of the Organized Reserve Corps, and supporting combat and service units.

AUTHORIZED PERSONNEL STRENGTH

SEC. 102. Within the active-duty strength of the Army of the United States of eight hundred thirty-seven thousand officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, established by Public Law 759, Eightieth Congress, there are authorized eighty-two thousand three hundred officers, nine thousand warrant officers, seven thousand five hundred female medical officers and seven hundred thirty-eight thousand two hundred enlisted persons. Section 501 of the Act approved August 7, 1947 (Public Law 381, Eightieth Congress), is hereby amended by striking out the words "fifty-one thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "forty thousand"; and hereafter the active list commissioned officer strengths authorized in said section shall apply to the Regular Army, exclusive of the United States Air Force. The numbers herein authorized shall not include such one-year volunteers for training as the Congress may authorize, officers required to train such volunteers, officer candidates, nor personnel of the reserve components on active duty for training purposes only.

MATERIALS AND PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 103. The Army of the United States is hereby authorized the necessary equipment and facilities, including guided missiles, to fulfill the purposes of this title and to supply annually with modern standard items a minimum of six divisions and their supporting elements; to replace all equipment as it becomes obsolete or unserviceable; and to maintain such reserve of supplies and equipment as are necessary to support approved war plans. The Secretary of the Army is authorized to procure such equipment, spares, spare parts, guided missiles, and facilities necessary for the maintenance and operation of materials to carry out the purpose of this title.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 104 The Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to conduct, engage, and participate in research and development programs related to activities of the Army of the United States and to procure, or contract for the use of, such facilities, equipment, services, and supplies as may be required to effectuate such programs.

TITLE II—AIR FORCE

AUTHORIZED COMPOSITION

SEC. 201. The United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of seventy Air Force groups and twenty-two separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by sixty-one Air Force reserve groups, together with necessary supporting and auxiliary units. The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements, including tactical, administrative, logistic, air transport, and training, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized.

AUTHORIZED PERSONNEL STRENGTH

SEC. 202. The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized an active duty strength of seventy-five thousand and three hundred officers, including warrant officers (of which number thirty-five thousand may be Regular Air Force officers and four thousand and eight hundred may be Regular Air Force warrant officers), and four hundred and twenty-six thousand and seven hundred enlisted persons, which numbers shall be exclusive of such one-year volunteers for training as authorized by the Congress, officer candidates, aviation cadets, and personnel of the reserve components on active duty for training purposes only.

AUTHORIZED AIRCRAFT STRENGTH

SEC. 203. The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized twenty-four thousand serviceable aircraft to fulfill its requirements for aircraft necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act: Provided, That guided missiles shall not be included within the number of aircraft herein authorized.

PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 204. The Secretary of the Air Force is authorized to procure (1) five thousand two hundred aircraft annually to provide the number of aircraft authorized by section 203 and to replace such aircraft as he may determine to be unserviceable or obsolete, (2) guided missiles, and (3) spares, spare parts, equipment, and facilities necessary for the maintenance and operation of aircraft and guided missiles herein authorized.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 205. The Secretary of the Air Force is hereby authorized to conduct, engage, and participate in research and development programs related to activities of the Air Force of the United States and to procure, or contract for the use of, such facilities, equipment, services, and supplies as may be required to effectuate such programs.

REPEAL OF EXISTING LAW

SEC. 206. Section 8 of the Act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 780), as amended by section 1 of the Act of April 3, 1939 (53 Stat. 555), is hereby repealed.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 301. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act. Except as may otherwise be provided in the appropriation Act concerned, (1) any moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of section 103 and section 204 of this Act shall remain available for obligation during the fiscal year for which appropriated and the four succeeding fiscal years thereafter, and (2) any moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of sections 104 and 205 shall remain available until expended.

SAVING PROVISION

SEC. 302. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act, the authorizations herein contained shall be subject to the responsibilities, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment.

SEPARABILITY PROVISION

SEC. 303. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the Act and of the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. Members of the committee, we have with us this morning the distinguished Secretary of the Army, Mr. Royall. He has some engagements that will require him to leave the country sometime tomorrow. Therefore he is very busy getting ready.

He wants to make an opening statement, but the bulk of the detail will have to be furnished to the committee by the officers of the Army. So we will first start off with Mr. Royall and we will see what he has to say.

STATEMENT OF HON. KENNETH C. ROYALL, SECRETARY OF THE ARMY

Secretary ROYALL. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity of appearing before the committee in behalf of what we consider to be——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute.

If you photographers want to make any pictures of the witness, make them before he starts because we don't want him to be annoyed by pictures as he is testifying. So, if you want to make any pictures of the Secretary, go ahead and make them now. You can't make any more at the time he is testifying. We are willing to accommodate you and cooperate with you, but we don't want you to interfere with committee work. [Pictures taken.]

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you photographers must not take any pictures while the witness is testifying because it is annoying to the witness and detracts the committee's attention from what the witness is saying.

Now, Mr. Secretary, the committee will be very grateful if you will give us the reason for the justification of H. R. 1437 and why it should be enacted into law.

Secretary ROYALL. Yes.

As Secretary of the Army it is my duty to recommend to Congress, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense, an authorized strength of the Army of the United States.

I am here today with General Bradley and other members of the Army General Staff to explain the Army provisions of H. R. 1437. General Bradley plans to cover the specific provisions of the bill and key members of the staff are prepared to answer any detailed questions you may have, so that my remarks will be brief and confined generally to the purposes for which the bill has been drafted.

Since the cessation of hostilities in 1945, your committee has devoted a large proportion of your time and effort toward providing current military forces sufficient for the immediate security of our country and for the support of United States policies at home and abroad.

With changing international conditions it has been necesary for the Congress to frequently reevaluate the military position of the United States and to consider what additional military measures, if any, should be adopted.

Our best estimate of the world situation does not indicate that war is imminent. As the members of this committee will recall, I think I said that every time I appeared before them last year, and I have not changed my view. I do not think that war is imminent.

However, we would be, I think, rather blind if we did not realize that it is at least a possibility. And there appears little likelihood that for a number of years to come we will be free of an international situation fraught with danger and subject to marked fluctuations.

Under these circumstances, it is highly desirable, from several standpoints, that we have a more realistic long-range authorization for the Army and for the Air Force.

One advantage, to the Congress itself as well as to the departments, is that it obviates the present duplicating task of having to pass an authorizing bill in addition to an appropriation bill every time there is a revision.

But the more important advantages of this bill are to provide an authorization framework for national security planning and to permit flexibility in this planning—a flexibility which present and prospective world conditions require.

The authorizing legislation in this bill will permit us, within reasonable limits, to readjust strengths and composition of forces and to readjust equipment and other resources to meet the changing needs which are likely to occur.

The proposed bill also establishes a firm basis for military training—current and future planning up to the premobilization stage. This is not a mobilization bill.

Digitized by Google

In developing mobilization and premobilization plans it is of utmost importance that we arrive at a balance between forces which must be maintained in full readiness for war. That is, in our planning we have to know what that balance is from a long-range standpoint.

We must plan for forces which can be maintained in partial readiness for war and forces which can be developed from civilian manpower resources if war should break out.

This proposed legislation establishes what you might call the end point of our premobilization curve.

These are the principal reasons for the legislation—the same reasons which induced the Navy to request, and Congress to enact, a Navy long-range personnel authorization bill in April of 1946. As most of you gentlemen know, the Navy has an authorization bill, and the Army and the Air Force do not. The only thing we have is the greatly outmoded National Defense Act in its final form of 1920, which is manifestly not calculated to deal realistically with the present situation.

The Army has so far refrained from submitting a request for a new authorization, first, because of the impending separation of the Air Force. We did not think a complete evaluation could be made until that was done. And, second, because we have been hoping against hope that we could safely settle down, for all the services, to a static and peacetime establishment.

The passage of this proposed legislation is an essential step in the separation of the Air Force from the Army and will also bring both of these services on a statutory parity with the Navy.

I think I could say, without any fear of equivocation from any service, that the figures we suggest are acceptable and favored by the other two departments. And I can say, for the Army, that the Air Force bill which will be presented to you has the full approval of the Army.

The proportions of the three services which this bill would give—that is, for the Air Force and for the Army—are well in line with the figures which this Congress, that is, the last Congress, on the recommendation of this committee fixed for the three services in the Selective Service Act. So your committee has already considered to quite a considerable extent the same figures which are presented here, and upon your initiative they were incorporated in the act last year. I mean the Selective Service Act, which, of course, is temporary legislation.

Finally, may I emphasize the fact that this authorization bill does not in any respect deprive Congress of the right to fix the size of the forces in existence at any particular time by appropriation bills. Within the framework as established in the bill, Congress will appropriate funds for the forces for each particular year in accordance with the situation then existing.

The pattern of events, gentlemen, shows that our military establishment during this period—which has been called the "cold war" period—shows that our Military Establishment must be an adequate one, adequate for each changing situation.

We cannot forecast, unfortunately, the length of this uncertain international period, but I think we will all agree that the sensible course today is to plan by a span of years and not merely from crisis to crisis.

That is the statement I desire to make to the committee.

Digitized by Google

I will be delighted to undertake to answer any questions that you care to address to me. I would like the committee to bear in mind, as the chairman has already stated, that we have members of the staff who can give more detailed information, but that certainly does not indicate that you can't ask me the same questions.

I am sorry I cannot stay during the entire hearing, but I am leaving tomorrow and I have a lot of things to take up before I leave. I may be gone for two and a half weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Secretary. Your statement clearly sets forth the reason and justification for the enactment of this bill.

Are there any questions from any members of the committee to the Secretary?

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to ask him this question, if I may, Mr. Chairman:

Mr. Secretary, are you in a position to state whether or not the provisions of H. R. 1437, insofar as affecting the Department of the Army is concerned, meet with your approval?

Secretary ROYALL. It does. The bill, as you know, has been redrafted and changed in some respects from the printed copy, the original printed copy. One material change is that we have stated the authorization of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the reserves in numbers, total numbers, rather than in units. The reason for that, I am sure, is apparent.

Even in the memory of some of the younger members of this committee the size of divisions has been almost cut in half. We are considering, and using, today, regimental combat teams. Therefore, the type of unit and the size of the unit must be flexible to meet changing circumstances, and it is better to define the limits in numbers rather than by number of units.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions from any other members of the committee? Anyone who wants to ask the Secretary a question, have no hesitancy to do so.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Secretary, I would like to have you tell the committee what studies this recommendation is based on.

Secretary ROYALL. Last year, when we were considering the size of the three forces, we made a very detailed study of the requirements of the Army and those, I think, were presented in considerable detail both on the record and off the record to this committee.

Mr. COLE. In connection with what legislation?

Secretary ROYALL. In connection with the selective service legislation. And this committee, I believe, arrived at the conclusion that 837,000 was a proper amount. However, we have restudied these figures to see if there were any changes in conditions that would suggest a medification upward or downward of the 837,000 figure which was presented last year to you, and we are of the opinion that it is still applicable as an upper limit for an authorization bill.

Mr. COLE. Was any expression sought or obtained from the National Security Council with respect to these recommendations?

Secretary ROYALL. The Joint Chiefs of Staff were the ones who dealt with this primarily, on the National Military Establishment level. The National Security Council does not normally get into the exact size of a Military Establishment. Their functions more largely deal with the policies to be followed from a military standpoint.

Mr. COLE. Certainly the size of our Military Establishment has a direct relationship to our national security.

Secretary ROYALL. Yes, that is right. We have, of course, two bodies, in which, unless we wanted to have a complete duplication, we must divide the functions somewhat. As I say, the size and composition and equipment of the forces is normally considered first by the departments and then by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Certainly, the National Security Council, I think, could take hold of that problem if they wanted to, but——

Mr. COLE. At any rate, it has not been presented to the Council and the Council has not acted on it?

Secretary ROYALL. No, it has not. It has been presented to the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Mr. COLE. Then I assume, from what you have said in connection with that, that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered this problem and this represents their recommendation.

Secretary ROYALL. That is correct, sir.

Now, as to the National Security Council, while it has not been presented to them, I am certain that the figures have been used before that Council in a number of instances in general discussions. So they are certainly advised of it, at least.

Mr. COLE. Well, I quite agree with your statement that it is not wise for the Departments to come constantly to the Congress for reevaluations and restudies. It was my impression, when the Congress fixed the strength of Army, Navy, and Air Force in the Selective Service Act, that that was permanent legislation and it was not tied in with the duration of the authority to draft people.

Secretary ROYALL. I do not believe that technically is the case. I think that expires when the draft law expires.

Mr. COLE. Then either the Department is at fault or, at least, inconsistent in taking the position now that it is not wise to come up every other year to fix the size of our Military Establishment if last year they came up here and ratified what Congress did, but only for a 2-year term.

I do not know—maybe can clear up from our staff as to whether——

Mr. BLANDFORD. The Act expires, as I understand it, Mr. Cole, in 1950; and the Army feels, I believe, that possibly this authority expires with it in 1950 as to the authorized strength.

Mr. COLE. There should not be any room for doubt as to what the law says as to whether the numbers fixed in the draft law as constituting the size of our Military Establishment disagrees with the authority given in that same act to draft people.

Mr. KILDAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Secretary ROYALL. I think that is correct. One of our officers says that there is some possibility for the interpretation which you first suggested—that it may continue.

However, even if that were true, this bill also provides the size of the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and it specifies, or puts a limit on, the number of Regular Army officers and the other items in here that I think should be enacted.

Mr. COLE. Then this bill——

Digitized by Google

Secretary ROYALL. You see, that bill, Congressman Cole, was not primarily designed as an authorization bill. It started as a draft bill, and the figures were put in there primarily for the purpose of determining the limit of people that could be drafted.

But this committee, of its own initiative, conducted a very thorough hearing on the size of the Army. Therefore, those figures were carefully studied.

Mr. COLE. The authorized strength contained in this bill are in complete harmony with the authorized strengths inserted in the selective-service bill, which this committee and the Congress approved after quite considered deliberation.

Senator ROYALL. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do any other members have any questions?

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, you have indicated the Selective Service Act is a negative proposition. It does not authorize anything. It limits what you can go to.

Secretary ROYALL. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, of course, the National Defense Act provided for 286,000, if I remember correctly; and in our first Selective Service Act, in 1940, we provided not to exceed 900,000 people in training at any one time, and one of the contentions, I think, is that unfortunately we remove the limitation.

Secretary ROYALL. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. But this is an authorization. It does not mean you are going to have this many. It depends on whether the Appropriations Committee and the Congress give it to you. So it is in accordance with our tradition and our precedent that Congress specifically authorize the number of troops which shall be in the Army.

Secretary ROYALL. That is correct, Mr. Kilday. And I am glad you pointed out a very salient fact: that the limitation in the Selective Service Act was not an affirmative pronouncement in this bill.

Mr. KILDAY. Negative.

Secretary ROYALL. That is right.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Anderson.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Secretary, the bill before us (H. R. 1437) provides or authorizes 837,000 officers and men?

Secretary ROYALL. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the present composition—officers and men—of the Army?

Secretary ROYALL. The last spot figure I have is that the Army today is about 690,000 officers and men. However, that is what we call a flash estimate. We have a very firm figure of the 31st of December 1948, which I will give you. The total is 673,000, of which 68,400 are male and WAC officers, 4,600 are female medical officers—that is, nurses and specialists—and 5,000 are warrant officers. In other words, of all types of officers, there are 73,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, Mr. Secretary, when we passed the Selective Service Act of 1948, what was it contemplated that this full strength of 837,000 would be in the Army?

Digitized by Google

Secretary ROYALL. Well, it is difficult to answer that too dogmatically. When we put the figure in, we hoped that they would be authorized as of June 30 of this year.

Mr. ANDERSON. 1949?

Secretary ROYALL. 1949.

Now, thereafter 110,000 1-year trainees were injected into the bill, which would have made 947,000. But, because we thought we could get some use out of those trainees, we reduced the gross figure to 900,000.

Now, we have gotten only 17,000 of the 1-year trainees. Of course, they are not, from a long-range standpoint, of great value to the Army as a going concern. They get the training, and it is a good training program, but not as far as building up the Army is concerned. So we go back now to the original 837,000 instead of the 900,000 which was put in the draft bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. How long has it been, Mr. Secretary——

Secretary ROYALL. I mean the appropriation bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Since you inducted any men in the Army under the terms of the Selective Service Act of 1948?

Secretary ROYALL. We inducted last month.

Mr. ANDERSON. In December?

Secretary ROYALL. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, inductions are canceled for January and February?

Secretary ROYALL. And March.

General BRADLEY. Not for January.

Secretary ROYALL. Not for January. Those were already called.

Mr. ANDERSON. Those were already called?

Secretary ROYALL. Yes. For February and March.

Now, as to the reasons, first, the bill said that we should not draft unless we needed them. The reason we are pretty certain we will not need them was that our reenlistments were growing so rapidly.

Now, our enlistments were affected favorably by the draft law. They went up immediately after the draft law was passed. The incentive to enlist was increased. We built up our Army rapidly. We were running up to some 30,000 a month in some months. Now, we knew to stop the drafting of those men would cause enlistments to fall off; and, but for the fact that we were getting so many reenlistments, we probably could not have entirely stopped the draft even for 2 months. But we got 16,000 reenlistments in the month of December, and it looks as if we will get 17,000 this month.

With that fact in mind, we were quite certain we could maintain our strength without the draft. We think the draft law is absolutely necessary to keep on the books, and we are going to ask that that be done. But we do not believe that for the immediate future we are going to have to use it.

Mr. Chairman, may I digress to boast a little about the Army?

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead.

Secretary ROYALL. I really believe that the 18,000-a-month reenlistment is the greatest compliment that the United States Army has ever received. There has never been anything approaching it in peacetime conditions.

Mr. COLE. How do you account for it?

Digitized by Google

Secretary ROYALL. Because we got satisfied soldiers.

Mr. COLE. Well, might it not also have been that those boys could not get a job someplace else; so they decided to stay on?

Secretary ROYALL. Unemployment has not reached a great scale now. Of course, it is increasing; but, even before there was the extent of unemployment that there is today, and when you find 50 percent of your men wanting to stay in the Army, I believe that is a better compliment than any other sort of statistics can give you.

Mr. COLE. Well, I am happy to hear you say that because, as I read in the newspapers of the suspension of the draft by the Army followed by a discouragement of enlistments by the Army, to me it indicated the possibility that that may have been due to increased unemployment. I am glad to have your reactions that in your opinion it was not caused by unemployment but rather that service in the military branch of our Government is now sufficiently attractive to induce men to make it a career and stay on. I hope that continues to be the experience of the services. It is very encouraging.

Secretary ROYALL. Seven thousand in May, 8,000 in June, 10,000 in July, 11,000 in August, 12,500 in September, 14,000 in October, 17,700 in November, and 17,900 in December, and 8,248 for the first 14 days of this month; and, if that rate is maintained, it will run a little over 18,000.

Now, it probably will not be quite maintained, because the first week of the month is usually a big enlistment week.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other questions?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bates.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Secretary, what you say about reenlistments is true, because that is the news that we received from the oversea commanders a few weeks ago when they stated very clearly that they were amazed and pleasantly surprised at the large number of reenlistments, constituting over 50 percent of the men who were serving in the occupied areas. That was not, in their opinion, or mine or the committee's, due to any unemployment situation but to a high degree of patriotism on the part of the soldiers who realized that we might have a job to do, and might perhaps have a tougher job to do in the future, and they did not feel they were going to walk out on their buddies who were over there.

That was perhaps one of the great motivating factors for their staying on the job, in my opinion.

Now, Mr. Secretary, a question as to this 837,000 being the authorized strength under the so-called selective-service law. Are you retaining that full authorized strength today?

Secretary ROYALL. No, sir. We are setting our strength at 677,000 due to the budget figures.

Mr. BATES. That is what I was coming to.

Secretary ROYALL (continuing). That have been proposed.

Mr. BATES. In other words, you are not maintaining the strength of the Army as set forth in the selective-service law because of budget limitations submitted recently to Congress. That is the real reason you are not drafting these men?

Secretary ROYALL. Yes, sir. If we had to go up to 837,000, we would certainly have to draft for some months more; that is right.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BATES. So that is the real reason for stopping the draft, inasmuch as you are not up to the authorized strength set forth in the Selective Service Act. But you are not drafting only because you haven't the money in the budget to take care of that additional number?

Secretary ROYALL. I wouldn't think you could say "only because." Even with 677,000, unless our enlistments had greatly increased and our reenlistments had greatly increased, we would still have to draft even for the 677,000.

Mr. BATES. But if you had today an amount of money sufficient in the budget recently submitted to Congress to take care of the authorized strength set forth in the selective-service law, you would start drafting men today; would you not?

Secretary ROYALL. If either that condition existed, we would have to draft them; or, if our enlistments had not come up to the present standards, we would have to draft them. With either of the two, we would have to draft them.

Mr. BATES. One further question. Do you think the present strength of the Army is all you need for what you might call the emergency needs of today?

Secretary ROYALL. Well, of course, we think that 837,000 is the size army that the present-day conditions require. But we also understand that there must be given weight to other considerations, among them an important consideration being the soundness of our national economy and the solvency of our Nation.

Mr. BATES. Then, you think the limitations set forth in the budget are about as far as we can go?

Secretary ROYALL. That would be my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions from any of our distinguished new members?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Royall, why is there a need for this section 103 regarding matériel? Does not the Army have enough flexibility under existing laws to buy what is needed and is modern and up to date?

Secretary ROYALL. Well, it may be—you are talking about section 103?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Secretary ROYALL. It may be that that is not absolutely necessary, but that provision or one similar to it is in the Navy bill, as I understand it, and I think it is an appropriate provision which indicates the opinion of Congress and the action of Congress in favor of adequate equipment for this Army.

The CHAIRMAN. May I inquire, Mr. Johnson, if you have in mind anything particular with reference to the authorization for guided missiles?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason I am happy to see that in there is because under a strict interpretation by the Comptroller that might cause embarrassment. I do not want any embarrassment that the money appropriated cannot be used for guided missiles. It might be also subject to a point of order on the floor because there is no specific authorization anywhere, either in the Navy legislation or in the Army, or Air Force, for guided missiles.

Now, guided missiles have a definite meaning and for that reason it is, I think, very important that it be spelled out in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that clause is necessary. But as to these other ones, about the supply of modern, standard items of equipment, I though the Army had traditionally the right to keep changing their weapons to keep current.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, they probably have, but it will not hurt to put it in there to spur them up.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to ask one more question if I may, Mr. Chairman.

In your statement on page 2 you say that if authorization is granted it will bring the Army up on a parity with the Navy. Just what do you mean by that?

Secretary ROYALL. What I mean is that the Navy has an authorization bill and we do not have one.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are not referring to the numbers?

Secretary ROYALL. No; I was not in that sentence referring to the numbers. I did say, however, in response to inquiries, that the numbers of the three services had been discussed between them and I thought that they were all in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. You mean, then, that it would be on a legislative parity with the Navy?

Secretary ROYALL. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Secretary, this bill would give the Army, exclusive of the Air Force, 40,000 officers as compared with the present authorization of 51,000 for the Army and Air Force.

If the bill is passed, is it your intention to immediately commission the balance of them, or what is your program?

Secretary ROYALL. No; it is not. It is our thought that with an Army of 837,000, which is the authorization we ask, if we should reach that figure it would require around 80,000 officers in round numbers.

We think about half of them should be Regular officers and the others should be reserves or others called to temporary duty because that would give us more flexibility.

We also feel that 40,000 officers, if we went up to the limit of that number, would merely provide officers for an army of approximately 400,000 and that in present circumstances it is unlikely in any reasonable period we will get down below that.

However, we are not going to rush to fill those vacancies at this time. We will do it on a phased program.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, that is the basis of 10 percent officers?

Secretary ROYALL. Approximately.

Mr. KILDAY. Which has been traditionally true of ground forces. The Air Forces run higher, but 10 percent is regarded as the proper proportion of officers, is it not?

Secretary ROYALL. That is approximately correct; yes, sir. Of course, you realize that with specialties coming in in all services that that proportion may gradually vary, but it has not so far varied very much for the ground forces.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to prolong the discussion or the argument or belabor the point but for the sake of information and for the purpose of keeping the record straight I think it should be pointed out that this authorization is not necessary in order to establish this strength of the Army.

Section 2 of the Selective Service Act says that the—authorized active duty personnel strength of the armed forces—exclusive of certain ones—

is hereby established as follows: (1) of the Army of the United States, 837,000 plus 110,000 1-year enlistees; (2) of the Navy, including the Marine Corps, the present authorized statutory strength of 666,882 plus 36,000 1-year enlistees; and (3) of the Air Force of the United States, 502,000 plus 15,000 1-year enlistees.

Now, section 17 of that act, paragraph (b), says:

All of the provisions of this title except the provisions of section 2—

shall become inoperative on a certain date.

So a fair construction of that act would indicate that it is not a negative approach to the question of the authorized strength of the armed services.

It is a positive one, one which was enacted by the Congress and one which is permanent unless and until the Selective Service Act is repealed by the Congress.

Now, if the act expires by its present terms the authorized strength of the Army is fixed by a statute?

Secretary ROYALL. I do not——

Mr. COLE. I see no harm in reenacting it, but I do think for the purposes of the record it should be indicated——

Secretary ROYALL. Apparently there is a question on that point and as I say, one of our officers takes that same view. The limits were put in there, of course, for the purpose of fixing the size of the Army to be covered by the draft.

That was the primary purpose.

Mr. COLE. There is one other question. You said that the Department of the Army was going to urge that we keep the draft law on the books. Does that mean that you are going to urge an extension of it or that you are going to resist any repeal of it, or both?

Secretary ROYALL. I think we should have an extension of those parts which would expire because I believe that the presence of it is a helpful thing and if we shonuld reach the stage where any of the departments could not recruit up to the required number it will be necessary to resort to it.

Mr. COLE. Does that contemplate that your recommendation would be that the law be permanent?

Secretary ROYALL. Well, permanent in the sense that we think it ought to have no expiration date. Of course, if conditions change sufficiently in the world it might be wise to repeal it, but we do not see anything on the horizon that looks like that much sunshine.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions? If not, thank you, Mr. Secretary——

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I have a question I would like to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston, the gentleman from Ohio.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Secretary, I would like to ask you a little bit more about the authorization of the Budget Bureau. You say that it was authorizing 677,000. I would like to know whether or not that was in accordance with the recommendation to the Budget Bureau or whether or not you recommended the full 837,000 and you were stopped at the Budget Bureau?

Secretary ROYALL. Well, that is a rather complicated question to answer. We started out wanting 837,000. When the question of how much could reasonably be spent for national defense was fixed at around $15,000,000,000, then the three services restudied the matter in the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

And assuming that that limit was a necessary and proper one, which is the opinion of the National Military Establishment as well as the President, when that appeared, then we ourselves fixed the 677,000 as the maximum that we could provide for the Army and similar figures were fixed for the others.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, then, you feel that 677,000 is all that you will need for the present?

Secretary ROYALL. It is all that we will need if the $15,000,000,000 limitation is correct, and I think it is correct.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, I mean from the standpoint of national defense and security you feel that 677,000 is all you need.

Secretary ROYALL. If we disregarded every other consideration, national consideration, except national defense, I would want the 837,000, but I do not think we can disregard other matters of importance to the country, and I do not think the Department of the Army or the National Military Establishment can entirely overlook the fact that they are only parts of a Government that has many functions to perform.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I would like to ask you to explain and give us your interpretation of section 301, the saving provision.

I want to see what is in your mind and see if it is the same thought that is running through my mind.

Secretary ROYALL. Section what?

The CHAIRMAN. The saving provision on page 7:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the authorization herein contained shall be subject to the responsibilities, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment.

Now, what was in mind when that was put in the bill?

Secretary ROYALL. As far as I know, nothing was specifically in mind except a reiteration of the fact that within the authorizations the Secretary of Defense must exercise his judgment as to the proportion between the three departments.

That is the situation that confronts us today with the budget limitation. The Secretary of Defense, advised by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, would have the duty of reaching a decision as to how the number of men that could be obtained for the $15,000,000,000 was divided between the three departments.

Mr. KILDAY. That is a most remarkable provision to have in a law, Mr. Secretary:

> Notwithstanding other provisions of this Act, the authorizations herein contained shall be subject to the responsibilities, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Defense.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in that connection, Mr. Kilday, are not the powers and duties of the Secretary of Defense set out in the National Security Act and does that not positively state what his responsibilities are?

Now, would this confer upon the Secretary any veto power or anything beyond that which is set out in the National Security Act?

Secretary ROYALL. You are asking me? I think it would mean the responsibilities, powers, and duties which are now or from time to time set out in that act as amended.

I do not see any great harm about it. As a matter of fact, it may well be necessary to recognize that there is no independent right in any of the departments which he cannot adjust between them.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, but the powers of the Secretary of Defense are only delegated and the only powers he has are specifically enumerated in the National Security Act.

Now, what is worrying me: Does this confer upon him any more powers than that which have been specifically designated in that act?

Secretary ROYALL. I do not think it does. I think it merely assures us that this particular legislation does not diminish those powers.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Thank you very much.

Now, Mr. Secretary, the press photographers would like to take a picture of you as you leave.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Secretary. The committee wishes you a pleasant journey and looks forward to seeing you back soon.

Secretary ROYALL. Thank you, gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, may I suggest to all the members that they speak a little louder because the acoustics are not so good and the members back here cannot hear.

Now, members of the committee, I am honored and privileged to present to you one of the great soldiers of the Nation, Gen. Omar Bradley.

General, the committee would be delighted to have you make any observations, uninterrupted, with reference to the reason and justification for this bill being enacted into law.

STATEMENT OF GEN. OMAR N. BRADLEY, CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES ARMY

General BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I will read a prepared statement and then try to answer any questions which you may have.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right.

Let there be order in the committee room.

All right, now, General.

General BRADLEY. If the Army is to engage in sound long-range security planning, then it must be provided a comprehensive military policy, adequately defined and legally authorized by the United States Congress.

Today the Army is operating under the scattered authority of several antedated acts, stretching back to the First World War. These include the National Defense Act of 1916 with its substantial amendments of 1920, the emergency war powers granted the President in 1941 and 1942, and finally the strength authorization contained in the Selective Service Act of 1948.

H. R. 1437 would correlate in a single act of Congress the necessary authorizations in personnel, procurement, funds and authority to enable both the Army and the Air Force to program their needs and devise their plans within the limits clearly marked for them by statute.

This act would make possible an instant response to danger by providing both services with a cushion for prompt emergency expansion. It would eliminate the immediate need for enabling legislation to bring the Army and Air Force up to a state of war readiness. It would permit Congress to arm the Nation in an emergency and speed war mobilization simply by the appropriation of funds. It would not imperil or lesson control by Congress of our armed forces but it would materially shorten that time lag between our recognition of danger and preparedness for it.

I would like to depart from this statement for just a moment to recall how in 1939 and 1940 when we saw an emergency approaching, the authorized strength of the Army, as some members brought out, was about 280,000.

The actual strength by appropriations at that time was something around 200,000. The Congress authorized increases up to the 280,000 figure by appropriation acts only, and it was not necessary to take the time to pass additional authorization acts until they passed the 280,000 figure.

So the fact that 280,000 was authorized was a great help to the Congress and to the Military Establishment in increasing the Army up to that figure to help prepare for the emergency which everyone saw coming.

The Army's up-to-date manpower program for war readiness was presented during the second session of the Eightieth Congress when we asked an increase in authorized personnel to provide, among other benefits, a mobile striking force as part of our strategic reserve in the United States.

Because the bulk of our forces were already committed in occupational duties and in the maintenance of an establishment upon which we could rapidly expand in the event of danger, we recommended this enlarged authorization to permit us to construct a combat force capable of instant deployment.

This program was approved by Congress and incorporated into provisions of the Selective Service Act of 1948. It provided a foundation upon which the Army can rapidly create combat capabilities for minimum emergency missions.

It will enable the Army to undertake missions in support of the Air Force and to establish those critical footholds essential in carrying a strategic offensive to the enemy's land.

The size of this authorization was fixed by an estimate of the manpower required in minimum missions the Army might be called upon to perform. It was limited by the need to contain our peacetime military forces within the capacity of our economy to support them.

The Department of the Army recently sent to your chairman a copy of H. R. 1437 containing those revisions that we recommended be applied to our Service. These changes reflect suggestions from your committee as well as recommendations from our staff. Both of them are designed to produce the greater flexibility which I am sure you will agree is essential in any long-term military authorization such as this.

Although I dislike as much as you do the need for reading this prepared statement, I shall review these recommended Army changes, section by section. Other key staff officers of the Army are here with me and they will go into the pertinent details. I shall be glad to answer any question I can for you, and refer any that I cannot to my staff.

Section 101 provides an authorized composition for the Army of the United States. Its phrasing is patterned after that of the National Defense Act of 1916, as amended in 1920.

Because this wording has already survived the test of two world wars, we have retained its same broad and general provisions. Rather than ask an authorization for specific units, we have elsewhere in the bill recommended an authorization in personnel strength. Units are subject to change within personnel limitations. If the Army is permitted elasticity in the designation and maintenance of units, it is better able to adjust its structure to the contingencies with which it may be faced.

The CHAIRMAN. One minute, General, please. As you are taking up the bill section by section we can consider it by sections. Let me ask: Now, are there any amendments that the department is proposing to section 101?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give the committee the benefit of the amendment that you are proposing to section 101 right in this connection? Has the staff copies of it?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir. All the members have them also, Mr. Chairman.

General BRADLEY. The main thing the revised section 101 does is to cut out the specified units so that in future years as time and conditions change, the Military Establishment would not be bound to a certain number of units.

Shall I read section 101——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait 1 minute, General, please, sir.

Now, in the original bill, section 101 authorized 12 Regular Army divisions, five separate Regular Army combat teams, and some 52 divisions in the Reserve; is that correct?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you propose to eliminate all that?

General BRADLEY. Eliminate the numbers of units and type of units.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

All right. And you substitute in this proposal "The Organized Peace Establishment of the Army of the United States," and so forth.

All right.

Now go to section 102. Has every member a copy of this proposed amendment now?

All right. Go ahead.

Mr. COLE. Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, before you leave the subject. Is that proviso in the printed bill which you now seek to have stricken out a carry-over from the Defense Act of which you say this section was patterned after?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. The way it is printed, that is carried over from the Selective Service Act of last year. We did specify the units in that, I believe.

Mr. COLE. I understood you——

General BRADLEY. Maybe we did not specify in the act, but we defined it on those units. That is the way we originally arrived at the 837,000. It was based on those major units and the supporting units thereto, plus the service which we furnished to the Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if any members want to ask any questions in regard to the proposed amendment offered by the department to section 101, which is to strike out what is in the bill and substitute what is in the printed memorandum——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I read that, all you do there, General, is just lay down the broad category of the Regular Army, the National Guard and the Organized Reserves?

General BRADLEY. Yes. And in the next section we get to specific numbers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. Later you specified the units.

General BRADLEY. Numbers, not units.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, numbers. This just lays down the same classification we have had before?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. For years?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered to section 101 is agreed to.

Now, go ahead to your next section, which is 102.

General BRADLEY. Today the Army is operating under an active-duty authorization of 837,000 men. This ceiling was established by provisions of the Selective Service Act of 1948. To command this Army, we are authorized a regular officer strength of 30,600 men and women. We have additional Reserve officers serving on extended active duty.

This level of Regular officers was established by the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 and by administrative agreement thereafter between the Army and the Air Force. The regular warrant-officer ceiling was fixed at 1 percent of regular enlisted strength by an act approved by Congress in 1941.

In section 102, we confirm the desirability of authorizing a personnel strength of 837,000 for the Regular Army. While it is unlikely that we can safely support so huge a force in a peacetime economy, this authorization will provide a comfortable cushion for expansion in the face of precipitant danger.

The estimate is a minimum one, determined only after thorough evaluation of the responsibilities heaped upon the Army as a result of our Government's world commitments; and only after conservative study of our requirements in defense of the United States. Even this authorized strength of 837,000 would not produce an Army capable of anything more than minimum emergency one-shot missions.

It represents a compromise between desirable requirements for defense and what we could safely afford short of mobilization for war.

Digitized by Google

Obviously Congress cannot—and indeed will not—appropriate from year to year sufficient funds for the maintenance of this authorized force.

For the fiscal year 1950, the Army is recommending a force substantially below that authorization. We readily recognize that there is a reasonable limit to what a nation can safely spend for security without imperiling its economic survival. And it is perfectly apparent that changes in world conditions from year to year, changes in the economic and military health of our allies will justify fluctuations in the actual strength of the Army. But as long as we maintain a safe and comfortable margin for expansion in the event of emergency, Congress can—by its power of appropriation—readily and instantly improve the state of our defenses.

Because this ceiling of 837,000 men was calculated on the basis of joint capabilities of the several services, it may be desirable to point out that the Army's capabilities with such a force would complement those of a 70-group Air Force in our joint security plan. Only with such a force could we hope to provide ground support for a 70-group air force and still undertake those primary defense missions which would devolve upon the Army in the event of war.

Again I would like to depart from this prepared statement. I am not implying in any way that this statement means that is just our part of an over-all force. This force of 837,000 was arrived at after carefully studying war plans which involved the use of the 70-group air force and the service support which we must give.

You may even remember that last year when I first appeared before your committee, we recommended 820,000 because at that time we did not know the Air Force was recommending an increase. When they did, we had to add 17,000 to that for additional service troops to help them. So this is based on our part of working with 70 groups in actual war plans and the service support which we must furnish them.

In recommending this 837,000 figure, we have not attempted to break it down into separate categories of personnel. To have done so might have bound us to an inflexible structure, inconsistent with our changing needs. The ratio of officers to enlisted men is not the result of a mathematical formula.

Rather it is a variable, fixed by the missions assigned to the Army. If we are relieved of a share of our responsibilities in military government in Germany, Austria and Japan our requirement for officers will be reduced. On the other hand, if we are to put added emphasis on the training of our reserves, those officer requirements might be increased.

Each year this ratio between officers and enlisted men is reviewed carefully both by the Bureau of the Budget and by the Appropriations Committee of Congress. Again, in the appropriation of funds, Congress exercises complete control. We recommend this procedure as a preferable and sound basis of establishing year-to-year strength both in officers and enlisted men. There are too many variables at work to make an arbitrary ratio a practical one.

In contrast to the existing authorization for 30,600 regular officers, we have recommended an authorized strength of 40,000 commissioned officers for the Regular Army. This would provide only one-half of the estimated strength required to officer an authorized 837,000-man Army.

Our present authorization was established in section 501 of Public Law 381, enacted by the Eightieth Congress in August 1947, prior to the separation of the Air Force from the Army. This act provided an authorized officer strength of 51,000 for both the Air Corps and the Army.

It was a trial-and-error estimate; the figure was not geared to any over-all authorization in strength for the services and it was not based upon experience factors. Since separation of the services, we have studied the problem in detail and we recommend this revised authorization to provide a balance in the upward revision of authorized enlisted strength.

Rather than pin warrant-officer authorization to 1 percent of enlisted strength, we have estimated requirements on the basis of an Army-wide job analysis. In recommending an authorization for 9,000 Regular wrarant officers, we have counted the number of specialist jobs. Not only can warrant officers be qualified by training and experience to take on these specialist jobs, but in so doing they will help to release officers for general-duty assignments.

In estimating an authorized strength for Reserve components we had first to determine what our mobilization requirements shall be. Mobilization demands full utilization of the vast manpower resources of both the National Guard and the Organized Reserve.

The ability of the Army to take to the field in a sustained strategic offensive is heavily dependent upon hasty deployment of a ready and well-trained National Guard. At the same time, we must maintain in varying degrees of readiness a strong Organized Reserve, so organized and formed that its complete mobilization can be accomplished swiftly and in orderly fashion. The Organized Reserve is the reservoir of decisive officer strength.

In this bill we have recommended a total personnel authorization of 750,000 for the National Guard and 980,000 for the Organized Reserve Corps.

The National Guard strength represents the maximum rather than the reasonable number that the States could be expected to support. The authorized strength of 980,000 for the Organized Reserve represents the trained Reserve in manpower required to meet mobilization requirements.

At this present time it is impractical to assume—or to even envision—that the National Guard and Organized Reserve Corps can attain these strengths without UMT or some such similar legislation. But in recommending legislative authorizations for long-term needs and for indeterminate conditions we feel it is wiser to list requirements rather than to limit ourselves to present availabilities.

To strengthen our warrant officer program, we have recommended an authorization for warrant officers in the Organized Reserve Corps. This would give the Reserve parity with the National Guard and the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, gentlemen, do you have any amendment now to section 102? And I will ask the clerk to read that amendment—that is, I will ask the staff to read it. Mr. Blandford, read it.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BLANDFORD. The amendment to section 102 would be as follows: In lieu of the present section 102, substitute the following:

There is hereby authorized for the Army of the United States an active duty personnel strength of 837,000 officers, warrant officers and enlisted persons, exclusive of such 1-year enlisted volunteers for training as are authorized by Congress, officer candidates, personnel of the reserve components on active duty for training purposes only, persons paid under the appropriations for the National Guard and Organized Reserve Corps, and personnel and units of the reserve components ordered to active duty in an emergency hereafter declared.

The CHAIRMAN. The Department is suggesting that in lieu of what is in the original bill?

Mr. BLANDFORD. No, sir. That is just a part of it. There are several sections.

The CHAIRMAN. (b) Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

(b) Of the active duty personnel strength authorized in subsection (a), not to exceed 40,000 may be active list commissioned officers of the Regular Army exclusive of the numbers authorized by law for the Army Nurse Corps and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps; and 9,000 may be active list warrant officers of the Regular Army. Section 501 of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 883) is hereby amended by striking out the words "fifty-one thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "forty thousand"; and hereafter the active list commissioned officer strength authorized in said section shall apply to the Regular Army, exclusive of the United States Air Force.

(c) There is hereby authorized for the National Guard of the United States a personnel strength, to be distributed among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia as the President may from time to time direct, of 750,000 officers, warrant officers and enlisted persons, excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States that are counted within the personnel strength of 837,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section.

(d) There is hereby authorized for the Organized Reserve Corps a personnel strength of 980,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States that are counted within the personnel strength of 837,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section. Persons may be appointed as warrant officers in the Officers Reserve Corps under such regulations and in such numbers as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. I think, General, that is a great improvement over the section as originally introduced.

Now, that means, and everyone can understand, that the limit is 837,000 for the Regular Army, the National Guard, 750,000 and 980,000 for the Organized Reserve, making a total of 2,567,000. That is the pattern, is it not?

And of that number, the Regular officer strength will not exceed in the Regular Army more than 40,000; is that correct?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, General.

Any questions on this section now? This is the heart of the bill.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, are we going to proceed to act today on this authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. We are going to proceed to go along in an orderly way and cross every bridge when we come to it.

We are not going to vote the bill now.

Mr. HAVENNER. We are to act on this bill for authorization of the National Guard and Reserves without hearing any representatives——

The CHAIRMAN. We will probably hear from anybody——

Mr. HAVENNER. I mean, are we going to act on this today and authorize it without hearing from them?

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know of anyone objecting to a National Guard or Organized Reserve, as large as this.

Mr. HAVENNER. We want to hear from them.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I am not hunting up witnesses.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, we had an awful lot of criticism before this committee last year from the representatives of the National Guard and the Organized Reserve and I think if we are to proceed in an orderly and careful manner in legislating here we ought to hear from them.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Mr. Havenner, we will be glad to have any member—anybody indicate they wanted to testify?

Mr. KILDAY. General Reckord is here.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not want to fuss about this. All they are going to fuss about is not getting the number they want.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. We are not going to pass this bill out today. Let us ask questions of the general and we will get to the National Guard and Reserves later on.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Wait 1 minute.

So the Department is offering this as an amendment in lieu of what is in the bill?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, we will consider the amendment by the department. Mr. Bates, any questions?

Mr. BATES. General, in respect to the 837,000 authorized strength, has there been any transfer of personnel or duties, say, from engineers, quartermaster, medical, and so on, in the Army to the Air Corps, or are they setting up any separate organizations for those in the Air Corps?

General BRADLEY. This is a very excellent question, sir, because we are still in the process of trying to separate functions with the Air Force in accordance with the act of 1947. They have not been completed. We still have considerable numbers of units and personnel serving with the Air Force.

We have Air Force serving with the Army. And as you know, we furnish many services to them.

Mr. BATES. That is right.

General BRADLEY. Both in procurement, storage and issue. It is very difficult to separate the two functions.

Mr. BATES. That is where the question of unification comes in, whether or not there is going to be a duplication of facilities or services, say in the setting up of dispensaries, hospitals, quartermaster facilities, and personnel.

There may be a duplication there of what the Army is now doing. And in the light of our desire for coordination and unification, I am hoping that some way will be found by which those services will serve both military facilities.

General BRADLEY. We are actually doing that now.

Mr. BATES. That is right.

General BRADLEY. Many studies are going on now by the direction of Mr. Forrestal to accomplish even more.

Mr. BATES. They have not been completed yet?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Mr. BATES. So they will be continuing?

General BRADLEY. Yes, for some time to come, trying to join up and save by rendering common service.

Mr. BATES. Thank you.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, when you fixed your figure of 837,000 you had to make certain assumptions. You had to assume there were going to be certain groups and services in the Army.

Now, did that include what we know as the Engineer Corps of the Army the people who work on rivers and harbors and all those jobs? Are they going to remain in your organization?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. It includes all military personnel, of course, a lot of those are also civilian personnel.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that. I am only talking about the military personnel—the district engineers and all those. They are going to stay in your organization.

General BRADLEY. It does include those.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the civil function of the Army, is it not?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope the civilian function will remain in there. But I am going to call the committee's attention tomorrow to a bill that gives the power to take them out. I hope the committee will not go along and take them out.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the committee will go along with you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope the committee will keep the civil functions right there. I will ask the policy committee to meet tomorrow morning at 9:30 to discuss that situation.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask one more question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the event they finally get separated from the Air Forces, then might you not have to have a readjustment of this?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I do not think so. I do not think the numbers that will remain, involved between us, are such as to affect this number. We have gotten down to a comparatively small number that we may transfer to them or they may transfer to us. So that is not sufficient to affect this to any material extent.

You see, we will continue to furnish them services, in the way of purchasing food, for example.

We are purchasing food for all three services, as well as certain arms, equipment and ordnance, and medical, and so forth, for the Air Force.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, the Air Forces will probably have a building program on this themselves, to build airports and all kinds of facilities?

General BRADLEY. It is not contemplated that that will be separated. In some cases they do have aviation engineers to maintain as part of their tactical organization.

Mr. JOHNSON. The building is now done by the Army engineers; is that right?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. The construction is done by the Army engineers.

Mr. JOHNSON. You think that will continue to be that way after the separation?

General BRADLEY. Well, I should think that that is one thing where we could keep it this way and might even improve on it as we go along by rendering that common service.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. General Bradley; you indicate in your statement that you recommend this enlarged organization to permit the Army to construct a combat force capable of instant deployment. Can you construct such a force with less than 837,000?

General BRADLEY. Yes, except that it gets back to the definition of instant deployment. "Instant deployment" does not mean that you can start them out on D-day. It means something that will enable you to start toward a deployment. And, of course, with something less than 837,000 you cannot accomplish the same missions on D-day or immediately thereafter that you can with a greater number.

For example, with 837,000 we had contemplated having 12 regular army divisions, pretty well up to strength, and they would be available in an emergency.

If you cut down that number, you reduce the number of divisions or supporting units to something less than that and that means you will be somewhat delayed getting additional divisions into action which woud have been available had you had the total of 12 and the supporting units that we had figured to go with it.

Mr. ELSTON. I am wondering what you mean by the statement:

even this authorized strength of 837,000 would not produce an army capable of anything more than minimum emergency, one-shot missions.

General BRADLEY. Well, as we know, in the last war we had to go up to something like 8,000,000 Army and Air Force together, of which the army had over 5,000,000.

We expect in any future war you would eventually go way beyond this 837,000. But that 837,000 is a point on your mobilization curve toward which you can do definite planning if we have this authorization.

What we do beyond that 837,000 on the mobilization curve will depend upon circumstances and have to be reviewed some time later after an emergency has appeared or actually happens.

But we can, with this authorization bill, keep our plans current for that number of men and the units it will provide.

Now, we may change units. The next Chief of Staff that comes along may not like the division we have now and make twice as many or make them half as big.

So we would not like to see the future tied down too much to present conditions.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like to ask you, General Bradley, if you can support a 70-group air program with less than 837,000 men on active duty.

General BRADLEY. If you did, you would have to change our present strategic concept of the way we think war would be carried on. In other words, the units provided by the 837,000 are the army units that the planners now plan would be used with 70 groups of Air Force.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ELSTON. Well, if you are compelled to cut your force down to 677,000 instead of 837,000, could you, with the 677,000 men on active duty, support a 70-group air program?

General BRADLEY. We could not support it in their total capability. In other words, this capability with 70 groups would be reduced under what it would be if we had enough army units to go along with them.

Remember, we must protect the bases from which they operate. We must furnish them certain housekeeping services. To give an example, there is no use in their having enough planes to go to five bases, we will say, if we do not have the troops to hold but three. That is what I mean.

If they have enough planes to go to five bases, we should have enough troops to hold the five bases. I do not know whether I make myself plain or not, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, I think you do, General, but maybe not entirely in all respects. In other words, if the Air Force feels that they need a 70-group program in order to adequately defend the United States, what we want to find out is whether or not, if that is their viewpoint, the 677,000 men would be sufficient in the Army to adequately support them.

General BRADLEY. We do not think it would. We would be short in service support and we would be short of troops to protect the bases which their 70 groups would be capable of operating from.

Mr. ELSTON. How many groups would the 677,000 support?

General BRADLEY. We figure approximately 50 groups that we could support properly.

Mr. ELSTON. That is all.

Mr. DURHAM. After we authorized the 70 groups last year you came in and asked for 17,000 more troops. Was that taken into consideration? Congress has authorized the 70 groups in your planning.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. In the Air Force's original plans for a 70-group program they figured on a total strength in the Air Force of 400,000 men. The number of men included in the 820,000 was sufficient to furnish the necessary housekeeping services to this number of men in the Air Force. As a result of a restudy of their missions, the Air Force raised their requirements to 502,000 men. Their reasons for this increase were explained to your committee last spring. In order to furnish the necessary housekeeping services to this additional 102,000 men, the Army estimated that it would require 17,000 additional men. That is why we raised our figure to 837,000.

Mr. ELSTON. But if you were to carry out that 70-group plan at the present time you would have to ask for 17,000 more troops in your present planning?

General BRADLEY. We would have to ask for that number of service troops.

Mr. ELSTON. Service troops?

General BRADLEY. Then, if we were going to be able to perform our function of holding the additional bases which they could use with the additional number of troops we would need additional combat units, particularly division and anti-aircraft.

The CHAIRMAN. But it might be possible, General, that the bases would be so located where it would not be necessary for ground troops to defend them, for instance in the United States. The capacity of a long-range bomber might be of such nature that it would make a long-range raid from a base in the United States. Of course, you have reference to bases located close to the enemy?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. You may remember that last year, in testifying before this committee, I quoted General Spaatz. If I may, I would like to quote him again.

The CHAIRMAN. Do.

General BRADLEY. Because I think he probably has had more experience in strategic bombing than any other officer, certainly, that we have. If I may, I would just like to read that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is your pleasure.

General BRADLEY. I made this statement:

> Only last week, Gen. Carl Spaatz, in my opinion the foremost air strategist in the world, stated publicly that anyone who believed we could fight a future war with bombers based on the North American Continent, is suffering a delusion. General Spaatz also asserted that for a strategic bombing effort of the future to succeed would require bases nearer the target than many people realize.

You might deliver an initial offensive from this country if you had bombers of sufficient range. Personally, I believe if strategic bombing is to be carried on continuously and finally be effective your bases must be moved nearer and nearer to the enemy as you go along.

The CHAIRMAN. And you sum up by saying that it is necessary to have an actual strength of 837,000 in the regular service to properly support the missions of the 70-air group?

General BRADLEY. And get maximum use out of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, with 677,000 and a 70-air group, you cannot, then, get maximum mission out of the 70-air group?

General BRADLEY. In my opinion you could not, because they would be limited in the bases from which they could operate and we would also be limited in the service which we could render.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. General, I wonder if you would tell us what effect the joint usage of facilities ordered by Mr. Forrestal is having today upon personnel?

General BRADLEY. You mean in general or do you have any specific——

Mr. VAN ZANDT. In general.

General BRADLEY. It is saving personnel. It is a rather slow process, of course, to make these studies of how and where we think we can combine and save personnel, but such studies are going on all the time.

For example, a test is being made in the Sixth Army by a board headed by General Clark in which they are testing an army area, as to what can be done in the way of consolidations, for example, in the handling of recruits, the use of ports in San Francisco, and so on.

There are many studies of that nature going on, I think many more of them will be carried on.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will it not benefit you in the number of men that you have to assign in the Air Forces?

General BRADLEY. You mean by consolidating?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Yes; the joint use of facilities.

General BRADLEY. Yes; undoubtedly it would.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COLE. General, which, in your opinion, would be preferable from the standpoint of your responsibility for national defense, assuming that you are to be limited in your personnel strength to what it now is of 677,000: To have a 70-air group with a limited capacity as you have indicated or a lesser group, a smaller group, with full capacity.

General BRADLEY. Well, I do not think there is any question but what even keeping the Army at 677,000, the more air groups you add to the present contemplated approximately 50 groups, you are going to increase your defense and your power of offense to some extent.

But my statement was that you would not increase it to the same extent that you would by increasing the Army that would go along with it to protect its bases and service it.

If you went to 70 groups and we had to furnish the service of them, that would very materially reduce the number we would have available out of that 677,000 for combat units, because we would have to take many more than we now contemplate in that to service the additional groups of the Air Force.

Mr. COLE. Then, you will revise your statement to the extent that it is possible for you to support a 70-air group in its full potential with your 677,000 men.

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Mr. COLE. But in doing so it would diminish your capacity to do the other work that you are responsible for?

General BRADLEY. Well, my misunderstanding of your question was in the word "service." If you are talking about service support, we can service support them out of the 677,000, but by so doing we would have to reduce the number of combat units to a point where our capability in the Ground Forces would be much reduced out of what we would expect to get under 677,000.

Mr. COLE. Which would you prefer to have: A 70 air group and be able to support them in a way in which their potential would be limited and not up to its full potential or to be able to support a smaller air group and to support them to the full extent of their striking force?

General BRADLEY. I would prefer to have a smaller number of air groups if it meant that you were not going to be able to hold any bases and service them properly.

Mr. COLE. That seems sensible to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Now——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, on that same subject——

The CHAIRMAN. I just want to ask him a question. Let me ask you this, General: Then you say that 677,000 men will be sufficient to defend adequately whatever bases it would be necessary to set up for a 70 air group, but in doing so you would limit your striking power.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. And I would not go so far as to say "adequately defend," because that is a hard term to define.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, to defend, then. The 677,000 enlisted strength today is sufficient to take care of the bases to carry on strategic warfare under the conception of where they should be located by General Spaatz or anybody else, but if you did so, then it would diminish your ability to have a sufficient striking force, is that correct?

General BRADLEY. If you are referring to service support, we could furnish such support at the expense of our ability to carry out our combat missions. However, as I pointed out before, such an arrangement would completely change our present strategic concept. With your permission, I would like to expand on this statement. Apparently, there has been a tendency in this country during the last couple of years to place almost our whole dependence for defense on air power and our possession of the A-bomb. I wish that I could agree that such a concept is sound. I believe most of us agree that the first step to be taken in case of hostilities is the launching of a powerful strategic bombing effort. Only a very few of the people in the services believe that such an offensive would in itself be decisive and end the war. We all agree that the threat of such an offensive is a leading deterrent to war. We all agree that it would greatly affect the ability of any possible enemy in their later efforts in the war. Most of us believe that after starting this concentrated strategic bombing effort that many more steps toward winning the war would be necessary.

For example, we must protect vital installations in the United States against hostile attack. We must remember that strategic bombing is a two-edged weapon and we know that strategic bombing is being developed by some countries which did not have such a weapon during the last World War. We must hold with ground troops those bases from which effective bombing could be brought against our vital industrial areas. Even then it may be impossible to prevent isolated cases of air attack. We must hold with combat ground troops bases from which our strategic bombing can be brought against enemy targets. All of the required strategic bombing cannot be done from the United States even though I appreciate that such bombing could contribute materially to the strategic bombing effort. Finally, if we are eventually to bring our great strength to bear against any possible enemy, we must be prepared to do it with ground troops as well as air. If in placing too great a reliance on air power alone, we lose all areas or footholds from which we might bring our great power to bear, we would, in my opinion, be faced with a very long period of hostilities. And, of course, in order to do these things we must have a Navy that will keep the sea lanes open. I cannot express too strongly my feeling that in our efforts to find an easy solution to defense we may find ourselves facing the possibility of a very long, costly, and maybe disastrous war in any future emergency.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question in that same connection.

General, I cannot quite follow these figures. I understood you to say a while ago that your original figure of 820,000 was increased by 17,000 service troops in order to service an increase of from 55 air groups to 70 air groups.

General BRADLEY. Last year when I testified here, the hearing was on the basis that the Army had to be increased to carry out its occupation duties and still have something left over for a reserve of combat unit for use as a defense and for a striking force.

In the course of those hearings it came up also that the Air Force wanted to increase its strength from what it was then, 55 groups, to 70 groups. The Air Force also stated that a restudy of their missions showed a requirement of 502,000 men for 70 groups instead of 400,000. This addition of 102,000 required us to increase the authorization which we were requesting by 17,000 men in order to furnish that service.

Mr. HARDY. Well, the point that I cannot quite see is if you had to increase it by 17,000, I cannot quite see why you have got to go from 677,000 up to 837,000 if the Air Force is going to operate a 70-group force.

General BRADLEY. Remember, I am talking about supporting the Air Force in two ways. One is a service support and by that I mean running the ports and handling their supplies and buying them, issuing them, furnishing them medical care, and so forth.

That is the service support. And that is what the 17,000 was added for. The addition in there is to furnish combat units—divisions of various types, engineers, antiaircraft units, and so on—to protect the bases from which the 70 groups would operate in case of emergency.

Mr. HARDY. Well, that was contemplated in your original 820,000 then, was it, that you would have a sufficient force to protect all the bases for a 70 group?

General BRADLEY. Yes. The plans at that time——

Mr. HARDY. You only had 55 groups, did you not?

General BRADLEY. Yes, but the figure that we were figuring on, 820,000, as an authorization, contemplated almost the same deployment for the 55 groups that they had then as they now want to employ with the 70.

The number of bases for the 70 groups is not much different from that that they had at that time, which was 55. And they were in process of increasing this number. So the number of bases has not been increased very materially, but it has been decreased when you drop from the 70 down to the 48. That is in the strategic planning.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Gavin.

General BRADLEY. May I add just one more thing?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

General BRADLEY. Involved in that increase to 70 groups was an increase from 400,000 to 502,000, an increase of 102,000 more men for whom we have to buy clothes, and support in general.

Mr. HARDY. I understand all that.

Now, General, go just one step further. How many air groups will your 677,000 men take care of?

General BRADLEY. Well of course that is variable. It might be variable from, say 50 to 60, or somewhere in there. But the minute you increase the number of groups and we have to furnish the service support to them, they have to come out of combat units and combat capability.

Mr. HARDY. Well, your original authorization was for 820,000, figuring at that time you would take care of only 55 air groups, is that not correct?

General BRADLEY. Fifty-five air groups, yes, or approximately 400,000 men.

Mr. HARDY. But now you say you could take care of 70 air groups with that same complement plus 17,000 service troops.

General BRADLEY. I am afraid I do not get what you are aiming at.

The CHAIRMAN. May I try to clear it up. Here is what I think the gentleman has in mind. The 677,000 men will adequately furnish the logistics and the supplies and protect the bases, but it will absorb to to such an extent that he could not carry on a combatant unit or a striking force at the same time, is that not correct?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. And the units that we will have out of the 677,000 will be at reduced strength.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General BRADLEY. It will be a lesser number, and they will be at reduced strength as compared to what they were——

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, 677,000 men can take care of the 70 air groups, but at the same time it cannot take care of the air group and carry on an offensive warfare.

General BRADLEY. Nor adequately protect some of the bases they might use with that number of groups, and furnish other necessary defensive forces.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Gavin.

Mr. GAVIN. For the money already appropriated, how many air groups will it provide for?

The CHAIRMAN. May I suggest that Secretary Symington is going to be here tomorrow and he is going to talk about the air. I offer the suggestion that we confine our questions to the Ground Forces as much as possible.

Go ahead and answer his question, though, General.

General BRADLEY. I am afraid I cannot answer that because I am not sufficiently familiar——

Mr. GAVIN. Well, how many are they set up for now, General, 55 or 59?

General BRADLEY. For 1950?

Mr. GAVIN. Yes.

General BRADLEY. Forty-eight.

Mr. GAVIN. Forty-eight.

General BRADLEY. They have more than that at the present time.

Mr. GAVIN. And the appropriations, I presume, would cover 48?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAVIN. Do you think 677,000 men would adequately take up maybe 55 or 59 air groups that you could support and coordinate all the way around?

General BRADLEY. We would give them the service support, but we would have to reduce——

The CHAIRMAN. That is it.

General BRADLEY. It would reduce our capabilities materially and delay the time it would take us to mobilize and get certain units into the field, because in addition to the combat units which we must have ready we must also provide for a mobilization base for a great expansion after the emergency starts.

Mr. GAVIN. Well, with the appropriations made for the 70 air groups, you would not pick up today 837,000 that you already established.

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I am not prepared to recommend an army of 837,000 under present conditions.

Mr. GAVIN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, General, what we did last year, when we added $822,000,000 to the budget in the appropriation bill, was to provide for procurement which we hoped to have in 1952, I believe it was, and we added nothing for additional Air Corps personnel for this fiscal year.

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

The appropriation was for a 790,000-man army plus the 110,000 trainees.

Mr. KILDAY. Yes; but you mean when we added $822,000,000 on the floor of the House to the bill as reported by the Appropriations Committee it included nothing for personnel.

General BRADLEY. That was procurement.

Mr. KILDAY. That was all matériel.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. To get the orders started, hoping to have the equipment for 70 groups delivered in 1952?

General BRADLEY. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. And it would be by that time that you would have to have the additional personnel?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Not immediately, because we would not have the 70 groups until 1952.

General BRADLEY. You see, the 790,000 for which we had appropriations for 1949 fiscal year set up the necessary units but had some of them at reduced strength, but not as much reduced strength as we will be under the 677,000. It would have been easier to have expanded those units from 790,000 up to 820,000.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, I will repeat it again to keep the record straight, the 677,000 men can service a 70 Air Group, but when you do that it limits your capacity to perform other military duties and functions.

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bates.

Mr. BATES. A year ago, General under the urging of the military authorities we enacted a so-called selective-service law because of world conditions. Now, from the standpoint of world peace, do you think conditions today have deteriorated or conditions today are more deteriorated than what they were a year ago from the standpoint of world peace?

General BRADLEY. I am not too sure whether I should answer that in full in open session or not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BATES. I will withdraw the question.

General BRADLEY. I will be glad to answer that question off the record for you.

Mr. BATES. I will withdraw the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Anderson.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wanted to ask General Bradley how many are in the National Guard at the present time?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. The Army National Guard is approximately 300,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. Approximately 300,000.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. And how many men in the Organized Reserve?

General BRADLEY. Approximately 740,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is 740,000 of your authorized 980,000, is that right?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. Are you able to supply these 740,000 reserves with the equipment, the armories, and the rest of the material that they need to function properly?

General BRADLEY. Not at the present time.

Mr. ANDERSON. I found while I was home that most of the complaints came, not from the National Guard, but from the Organized Reserve. They feel as though they are the orphans of the storm; they are being left out at the edge of the table and picking up nothing but the crumbs; and that the Army is not paying enough attention to them.

I am wondering what your plans and your requests for appropriations contemplate for the coming fiscal year in connection with the Organized Reserve?

General BRADLEY. Our difficulty with furnishing the Reserve officers with proper instructions have been due to several causes: (1) Lack of funds; (2) lack of suitable instructors and administrators; (3) lack of proper training facilities like armories and places for them to train; (4) lack of proper equipment; and (5) and probably a very big one, is the situation which we have in the Reserve today where we have officers of all grades from colonel to second lieutenant and of all stages of experience from men who have commanded regiments in combat down to a man who just graduated from ROTC and other colonels, we will say, who have had no experience in combat, but was purely in administrative work, and add to that all the branches and services that they are in, and it makes the instruction very, very difficult.

Now, we are trying to straighten that out at the present time, and I have brought a senior officer into the Department of the Army Staff with the sole mission of trying to coordinate and push this question of training for the reserve components and particularly, as you say, try to help straighten out the reserve officer's instruction.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, as far as the use of armories go, General, has any effort been made by the services for the joint use of armory facilities?

General BRADLEY. We are working on that now, sir, all the time, trying to increase——

Mr. ANDERSON. Because I find the Naval Reserve program has proceeded at a much more rapid pace than that of the Army. They have armories established and well-organized units in training, and it seems to me that in many instances those armories could be used by the Army and the Air Force Reserve organizations.

General BRADLEY. We are trying to work out that arrangement. But I might call your attention to the fact that that part of the Naval Reserve you are talking about corresponds to our National Guard who also have armories and are making rapid strides in their training. The Navy has just the one reserve.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ANDERSON. The point is, do we have to have an armory for every type of organization: National Guard, Navy Reserve, Army Reserve, Air Force Reserve? Why can we not combine the use of these facilities for these various branches of the service?

General BRADLEY. We are trying to do that, sir, but one of the difficulties and what delays us in making these arrangements is the care and accountability of property. One unit that has its property stored there does not like too many people using it and losing it as long as they are accountable for it.

There is not enough storage space in some of the armories to handle the equipment required by the various units. That is one of the things we are trying to straighten out.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, it seems to me that that is a rather minor detail that ought to be cleared up very easily.

General BRADLEY. I think we can.

Mr. ANDERSON. Fine. I am glad to hear you are working on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions by any members of the committee?

Mr. HAVENNER. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California, Mr. Havenner.

Mr. HAVENNER. General, you stated that the Army recognizes that there is a reasonable limit to what a nation can safely spend for security without imperiling its economic survival. In your thinking on that subject, did you assume any percentage or approximate percentage of the total annual budget as a safety limit?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I do not believe we are in a position to express an opinion on that. We know our own problems, but I am afraid we do not know the problems of the other Departments enough to express an opinion on how much or what proportions we should get. I think that is something which the Congress can decide after they have heard all of the Departments.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I have one more question.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead.

Mr. HAVENNER. You stated, General, at present it is impractical to assume or even envision that the National Guard and Organized Reserve can attain these proposed strengths without UMT or some similar legislation.

Does that mean that this committee would understand that, if we enact the proposed authorization here, the proposed strengths of the National Guard and the Organized Reserve, that the enactment of that legislation would amount to sort of a legislative commitment for enactment of UMT or some similar legislation in the future?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I do not believe it commits anybody in any way. It merely sets a figure high enough so that if you decided to pass UMT you would not have to come back and rehold these hearings and set a new authorization.

Mr. HAVENNER. It would be authorizing a strength that in your opinion could not be attained without UMT or some similar legislation.

General BRADLEY. Or an emergency. If there were an emergency, you might very well, by congressional action and by appropriation, fill all National Guard units to war strength, for example.

And that would involve about, as I remember it, 750,000 to fill the presently authorized units to war strength. So you could do that by appropriations without going through another authorization bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another thing. It does not even authorize the Appropriations Committee or the Congress to give money enough to carry out what is written in this bill; does it?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It merely authorizes, but it does not require it.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to make it very clear, when I did favor these authorized strengths, I was doing it to guard against an emergency and not provide a commitment for UMT in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think we are going to get struck by UMT for some days yet.

General BRADLEY. I tried to make it plain——

The CHAIRMAN. Now, any other questions from any members of the committee?

Mr. COLE. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. General, who are the individuals to whom reference is made when you use the expression "1-year enlisted volunteers for training"?

General BRADLEY. Last year the Congress authorized 110,000 for the Army, volunteer enlistments for 1 year only, and they had certain obligations to perform after that year.

Mr. COLE. Yes; but there was nothing said that they were brought into the service for training only.

General BRADLEY. That "training only" was probably a poor word to use. They were available for other duties, but the primary purpose was to train them for duty, and that was the basis on which it was passed by Congress.

Mr. COLE. That is right. There is nothing in the selective-service law that contained any language to indicate that these men were brought into the service for training only.

General BRADLEY. It limited their use, you see, because we could not send them out of the country.

Mr. COLE. It only said that these 1-year enlistees could not be sent out of the country.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Except for that, they could be used for anything. So you would have no objection to changing that expression to conform with the language used here?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the staff any questions to propound to the General?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir; I would like to ask the General some questions with regard to rank distribution.

How is the distribution of officers by grade determined in the Regular Army?

General DAHLQUIST. The maximum is determined by a percentage of authorized strength. The minimum is whatever is set by the Secretary of the Army.

Mr. BLANDFORD. There are actually two factors, then, General. One is the Secretary's determination, and the other is your actual authorized strength?

Digitized by Google

General DAHLQUIST. Well, the maximum would be a percentage of the authorized strength.

Mr. BLANDFORD. That is not in effect at this time, but the Secretary could set——

General DAHLQUIST. That is in effect at this time. For example, in our grades of lieutenant colonel and major, we are authorized 14 and 19 percent of authorized strength. The Secretary has actually set it at 14 and 19 percent of actual strength.

Mr. BLANDFORD. And your colonels are set by law at 8 percent, and they are actually set now at 5.6?

General DAHLQUIST. On the Army as a whole, they are slightly over 5 percent.

Mr. BLANDFORD. In other words, your distribution can then be based on authorized strength, not "on board" strength, as in the Navy.

General DAHLQUIST. That is correct, so far as the Regular Army only is concerned.

Mr. BLANDFORD. That is correct. Now, has any consideration been given to any disparity in opportunity of promotion between the Army and the Air Force and the Navy? In other words, the Navy's distribution of rank is based upon "on board" strength, actual strength. Your distribution of rank is based upon authorized strength.

General DAHLQUIST. That is correct.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Has any consideration been given to any possible disparity of opportunity for promotion?

General DAHLQUIST. Yes. We have checked what the actual percentages in grades are, and it so happens we are the least of the three services.

Mr. BLANDFORD. So that has been discussed.

General DAHLQUIST. That is not quite correct. We are higher than the Air Force in the higher grades, but lower than the Navy in the higher grades.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you through?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now let me get that in my mind. The officer strength of the Army is based upon the authorized strength, 837,000 men?

General DAHLQUIST. The officer strength—the grade distribution of the Regular Army——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait a minute, General. I know the difference between the grade distribution and the officer strength. Now, the total officer strength is based upon the 837,000?

Mr. BLANDFORD. No.

General DAHLQUIST. The total officer strength from year to year is figured by the anual appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is based on how many enlisted men you have; is it not?

General DAHLQUIST. No, not entirely, because, for example, today we are using some 827 officers on military government which has nothing to do with enlisted strength whatsoever.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You have a total authorized strength, including officers and everybody, of 837,000. Now, so many of those are enlisted men. And, based on so many enlisted men, you determine you are entitled to so many officers; do you not, and that would be known as the authorized officer strength. Is that not the way you arrive at the number of officers you have?

General DAHLQUIST. Not entirely. We arrive at the number of officers on our total "on board" strength, Regulars and non-Regulars, depending upon the functions that we are performing. Our percentage of officers in the last 3 years has been gradually going down as we got rid of jobs which were purely officer jobs.

The CHAIRMAN. I see. Then you have no fixed formula to determine how many officers you have in contrast to the number of enlisted men you have.

General DAHLQUIST. That is correct, so far as the total Army on active duty is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Regular Army, I am talking about.

General DAHLQUIST. And, so far as the Regular Army, there is no fixed formula because we have adopted the proposal that we should not fill our active-duty officer strength with Regulars.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, officers in grade is based upon the same thing. It is based upon the same formula?

General DAHLQUIST. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you got 5 percent generals. Now that is based upon the same formula that you determine the total number you have.

General DAHLQUIST. We got a fixed maximum authorization for grades for the Regular Army officer strength. That is fixed by the law as a maximum. On the total officer strength, for example, today we have 22,000 Regulars, but we have almost 70,000 officers.

If we applied the same proportion that we do for the Regulars to the 70,000, we would have an excessive number in the top grades, because, as your Army increases, the necessity for top grades does not increase proportionately.

So today, although we have authorization for 8 percent colonels, over all, our actual percentage of colonels in the total Army is approximately 5 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the memorandum I have has broken down the officers by grades. You have 5 percent for generals.

General DAHLQUIST. That is five-tenths of a percent. For example, the law permits us to have three-quarters of a percent maximum in the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, colonels.

General DAHLQUIST. But we actually only have a half of 1 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Only half of 1 percent?

General DAHLQUIST. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the law allows you——

General DAHLQUIST. So far as permanent Regular Army generals are concerned, three-quarters of a percent of the authorized strength of the Regular Army officer corps only.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Any further question, Mr. Blandford?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

Now, General, just to make it clear, under the present arrangement, 19 percent of your Regular officers may have permanent commissions as majors and 14 percent may hold permanent commissions as lieutenant colonels; is that correct? That is based upon 31,000 officers.

Digitized by Google

General DAHLQUIST. The present maximum grade distribution in the Regular Army is 8 percent colonels, 14 percent lieutenant colonels, 19 percent majors, 23 percent captains, and 36 percent lieutenants.

Mr. BLANDFORD. All right. Now, if this bill is enacted into law, and the Secretary does not change that prescribed number, you will then base that percentage upon 40,000 officers instead of 31,000 officers and permit a large increase in permanent promotions; is that correct?

General DAHLQUIST. It would be possible for the Secretary to do so.

Mr. BLANDFORD. It would be possible.

General DAHLQUIST. However, he has had the authority for 2 years, has not invoked the authority, and has no plan to invoke the authority. We filled our permanent grade of colonels in order to get our attrition going, because we had a World War I hump. It so happens that today, on permanent colonels, the junior has 24 years' service. The junior permanent colonel in each of the other services goes many years below that.

Mr. BLANDFORD. That leads me to my last question, then. What are your plans, if you have any definite plans, for increasing the actual number of Regular Army officers, assuming that you would be authorized 40,000 in lieu of the present 31,000?

General DAHLQUIST. Our present plans would be that if we stabilize at approximately the strength we have today we will continue over approximately a 10-year period to come to a total authorized strength of 30,600.

Mr. BLANDFORD. You will not go to 40,000, then?

General DAHLQUIST. Not unless we stabilize at a higher active-duty strength.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General——

General BRADLEY. Are you going to ask another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I want to ask a question.

General BRADLEY. About the 40——

The CHAIRMAN. About this amendment, it says not to exceed 40,000. Now a person on the floor might say to me: "Tell us how you arrived at 40,000 officers." I would like for you to tell us how you arrived at 40,000 officers if it is not based upon something.

General BRADLEY. That is approximately half of the officers that would be required to officer an 837,000-man Army. We are opposed to going to any such figure if we can get our officers otherwise. As General Dahlquist just stated, our present strength in Regular officers is about 22,000, and we have adopted a 10-year program to arrive at the 30,600 which was authorized prior to this. There might be some circumstance, however, arising in the future in which you could not get officers without offering them a permanent commission.

In that case you might want to go to a 40,000, or have to go to a 40,000 figure to officer the Army that you had at that particular time. But we have no intention of going to that, and anytime in the foreseeable future, because conditions would not make us do it.

It was put there merely with the idea that someday you might have to go to the 40,000. But we do not contemplate any steps now which would go beyond the 30,600 toward which we have been working for the last couple of years.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. And you determined you need 30,600 on account of so many assignments and so many billets; is that the way you determined it?

General BRADLEY. I believe I had better let General Dahlquist answer that because he knows the details of it.

The CHAIRMAN. It looks like to me—this is off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. BROOKS. General, may I ask you this question: Do you mean that normally your wartime officer requirement would run about 10 percent? Is that true?

General BRADLEY. That is about right.

Mr. BROOKS. Now in time of peace, even though we have a cold war, I figure the requirements would not exceed half of wartime requirements. Is that what you have in mind?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; that is not quite right. The 837,000 is not a wartime requirement. It is merely as I say a point on the mobilization curve which you could reach without additional legislation.

Mr. BROOKS. Eighty thousand would be your normal officer complement.

General BRADLEY. Approximately 80,000 would be the officer complement for the Army.

Mr. BROOKS. Now in time of peace you take 50 percent. Is that the basis on which you reduce it, from 80,000 to 40,000?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; this 40,000 would be Regular officers and the rest of the 82,000 or whatever is required by the requirements and permitted by the Budget and the Congress would be Reserve officers on extended active duty.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, I see. So you make up your officer deficiency by calling Reserves into active duty.

General BRADLEY. We at the present time have only——

Mr. BROOKS. Now you are keeping your Regular officer requirements even below the minimum of 40,000 by calling men from the Reserves temporarily to be trained as officers.

General BRADLEY. You see, of the approximately 70,000 officers we have on active duty today, only 22,000 of them are Regular officers.

The CHAIRMAN. Now in that connection I would like to ask General Dahlquist: How do you determine how many Regular officers you have in the Regular Establishment now? I am not talking about the Reserve officers called back. How do you determine how many officers shall be in the Regular Army?

Is it based upon the enlisted men or what is it based on?

General DAHLQUIST. Let us first forget about the terms "Regular Army" and "Reserve" and think about the active Army.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is confusing.

General DAHLQUIST. Well, we analyze the jobs we have to do.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General DAHLQUIST. It so happens because of our civil functions, our military government, our very large Reserve component which has officer instructors, and the overhead we have to have—the schools—we figure out the officers needed for that. Now, when it comes to troop units, we average about 1 to 20 men for troop units.

Digitized by Google

A division of about 16,000 men has 800 officers. So we cannot set our officer commitment on the basis of the enlisted men on active duty because of the tasks performed by officers.

The CHAIRMAN. I see.

General DAHLQUIST. Now the problem comes up: How many of those should be Regulars? The easy system, the easy solution for us would be to have them all Regulars, but if we did that, we would first fasten upon the country a tremendous, large corps of career men, the expense of which is high because of the retirement provisions.

Second, we get out of that group only that many trained men. Therefore, when the war was over and the problem of increasing our Regular Army came up, General Eisenhower, before, I believe both committees, stated:

> We want to keep our Regular officer strength as small as possible, for two reasons: First, so that sometime in the distant future we have not got a machine which is beyond the capability of maintaining; and, second, to use as many spaces as possible to train Reservists on active duty. We ultimately hope that we will get the bulk of our ROTC graduates to come on active duty for 2 to 3 years before they go to civil life. Some of them will stay in the Regular Army. The remainder will go to the normal civil pursuits. We will then have a well-trained Reserve Corps. The number we must have in the Regular Army is that number that you must have to manage the organization and to give you a firm base. There is no empirical figure we can arrive at.

The CHAIRMAN. I see.

General DAHLQUIST. If we could, with 30,000 and an Army at strength of 837,000 we would do it, but our best estimate is that approximately half of our officers on active duty must be career men.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. Then, your plan is to keep approximately half of them, what I would call the Regular, and then to draw the balance from the Reserve.

General DAHLQUIST. Yes; and as time goes on from the new reservists who need active-duty training.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, we will take a recess until tomorrow. And General Bradley, will you and your staff come back?

General Reckord, do you want to make any statement about the generosity of the committee in giving you such a large group of National Guard? Are you in favor of it or against it?

General RECKORD. We like the idea of a large group, but we are not in favor of the bill as written at the present time. We would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; we will be glad to give you a hearing.

(Whereupon, at 12:05 p. m. the committee adjourned.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Friday, January 28, 1949.

(The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon Carl Vinson (chairman), presiding.)

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

General Bradley, will you and your staff please come around?

Now, General, when the committee recessed yesterday, while we were considering H. R. 1437, we had under consideration your amendment to section 102. Have you any additional amendments to that section that you desire to call to our attention?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir; I would like to suggest one additional change.

In section 102 (c)——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see, now——

General BRADLEY. We would suggest that you cross out the words:

as the President may from time to time direct.

The CHAIRMAN. (c)?

General BRADLEY. 102 (c).

The CHAIRMAN. (reading):

(c) There is hereby authorized for the National Guard of the United States a personnel strength, to be distributed among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, of 750,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, excluding those serving on active duty in the Army—is that the one you are dealing with?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir; and the way you have read it is the way we would like to have it considered.

Yesterday, the way it was read off, it had an additional clause in it—in the copy you had yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, what you are proposing now is:

(c) There is hereby authorized for the National Guard of the United States a personnel strength, to be distributed among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia of 750,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States that are counted within the personnel strength of 837,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section.

General BRADLEY. That is the way we would like to have it read, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, may I ask you: Does that meet the approval of the National Guard Association?

General BRADLEY. We understand and have been assured that it does.

The CHAIRMAN. General Reckord, come around here a minute, please, sir.

General RECKORD. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. General, come right up to the table.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I received your letter this morning. And I am regretful that I didn't have the clerk send you a copy of the bill when it was introduced so you would be conversant with it at that time. But I understand you have had an opportunity now to consider it?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any objection from your organization to the section as proposed by the Department of the Army?

General RECKORD. As now proposed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General RECKORD. We are in accord.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, we are happy to know that the National Guard has no complaint about the phraseology.

General RECKORD. Of that particular section.

The CHAIRMAN. Of that particular section.

General RECKORD. We have no complaint. In fact, we approve it.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire if this amendment which is now suggested is adopted and that expression "as the President may from time to time direct" eliminated, then who is to make the distribution of the National Guard among the several States?

General RECKORD. Mr. Cole, the answer to that is that allocations have been made to the States and they have been accepted by the States for the total number of units in the troop-basis plan which the Department has asked the National Guard to furnish toward that general plan in the whole scheme of defense. The States having accepted those allotments, they do not now wish by a new law to place themselves or have themselves placed in the position where any arbitrary change of allotment could be made without reference to the States.

The way the bill was proposed yesterday, it would have, in our opinion, amended section 60 of the National Defense Act, which now protects the State on all units that are wholly within the State. They cannot be changed or reallocated without the consent of the governor of the State concerned, under section 60.

This language which General Bradley has presented this morning will not amend section 60 of the National Defense Act, and is therefore entirely satisfactory to us.

The CHAIRMAN. I might add, General, there is grave doubt in my mind as to whether the language in the bill as presented yesterday would supersede or nullify section 60. But to make it absolutely sure that there is no doubt about it, why, you and the Department have gotten together?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir; we have.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; thank you very much.

Is there any other phase of section 102 that you are concerned about?

General RECKORD. No, sir; I think we have no concern.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, are there any further questions?

Then, you are offering, General, a new amendment to section 102?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the staff representative read the new amendment in its entirety to section 102.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Mr. Chairman, you want just 102 (c)?

The CHAIRMAN. Read the whole amendment. The proposal is to strike out entirely section 102 and substitute the following.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Substitute in lieu thereof section 102 (a). [Reading:]

There is hereby authorized for the Army of the United States an active-duty personnel strength of 837,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, exclusive of such 1-year enlisted volunteers for training as are authorized by Congress, officer candidates, personnel of the Reserve components on active duty for training purposes only, persons paid under the appropriations for the National Guard and Organized Reserve Corps, and personnel and units of the Reserve components ordered to active duty in an emergency hereafter declared.

(b) Of the active-duty personnel strength authorized in subsection (a) of this section, not to exceed 40,000 may be active-list commissioned officers of the Regular Army exclusive of the numbers authorized by law for the Army Nurse Corps and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps; and 9,000 may be active-list warrant officers of the Regular Army. Section 501 of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 883) is hereby amended by striking out the words "fifty-one thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "forty thousand"; and hereafter the active-list commissioned officer strength authorized in said section shall apply to the Regular Army, exclusive of the United States Air Force.

(c) There is hereby authorized for the National Guard of the United States a personnel strength, to be distributed among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia of 750,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States that are counted within the personnel strength of 837,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section.

(d) There is hereby authorized for the Organized Reserve Corps a personnel strength of 980,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States that are counted within the personnel strength of 837,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section. Persons may be appointed as warrant officers in the Officers Reserve Corps under such regulations and in such numbers as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson of California.

Mr. JOHNSON. General Bradley, I didn't notice yesterday, but I notice this morning, that you provide for 9,000 warrant officers in addition to the regular commissioned officers. Isn't that a pretty high ratio: 9 to 40. You have 40,000 commissioned officers and 9,000 additional warrant officers.

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I don't think so. And there was no intention of trying to work up a ratio between those two. The 9,000 is based on a job analysis of the jobs we think could be handled by warrant officers, thus relieving officers for more general duty. We didn't try to work it out on a percentage basis, but on a job analysis throughout the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON. You mentioned yesterday that the Army is getting more and more special jobs. Those kind of jobs are the ones you have in mind for these warrant officers?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought there was a sort of ratio heretofore, a general ratio between the number of warrant officers and the officer strength?

General BRADLEY. I believe the warrant officer number was based on a percentage of the enlisted strength and not of the officer strength.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the percentage?

General DAHLQUIST. One and a half percent of the enlisted strength.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could be warrant officers?

General DAHLQUIST. Warrant officers.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. The headlines of one of the local papers this morning stated that General Bradley had recommended an increase in the authorized personnel of the Department of the Army. I am satisfied in my own mind that this bill does not authorize any increase in personnel with respect to the 837,000 Regulars, and to that extent the headlines were in error.

Now, what I would like further to know is to what extent the authority under paragraph (c), with respect to the National Guard which authorizes 750,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted personnel, increases present statutory authority, if any?

General BRADLEY. I will take up the two points in turn. Certainly we know that the 837,000 is not an increase over what is already authorized by last year's Selective Service Act. If you are referring to the same article I saw by Mr. Norris——

Mr. COLE. Yes.

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. The headline does not quite correspond to what he wrote.

Mr. COLE. That is correct.

General BRADLEY. The reporter is very accurate, but maybe somebody else wrote the headline.

We did not ask for any increase in the authorized strength of the Regular Establishment.

The National Guard present authorization, as I understand it, is 500 men per Congressman—that is, for each congressional district; put it that way.

Mr. COLE. General Dahlquist, what is it——

General BRADLEY. Eight hundred for each congressional district.

General DAHLQUIST. I think it is 800 men for each congressional district.

Mr. COLE. Who is quick on figures? Let us have in the record what that amounts to; 348,000?

General DAHLQUIST. It is 800 per Congressman and delegate.

Mr. COLE. Can you tell us how many that aggregates?

General DAHLQUIST. About 400,000.

General CRAMER. Mr. Chairman, the answer to that is found in the National Defense Act of 1920, as amended——

The CHAIRMAN. One minute. Come around here, please, sir, and give your name to the reporter if you want to make a statement. We don't know exactly who you are back there, except you are highly decorated.

General CRAMER. General Cramer, Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what is it, General?

General CRAMER. The authorized strength of the National Guard is found in the National Defense Act of 1920, as amended, and is stated to be 425,000 enlisted personnel.

Mr. COLE. 425,000, roughly?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Then, this bill does amount to an increase of 325,000 authorized for the National Guard?

General CRAMER. That is in accordance with the authorization contained in the National Defense Act. The guard is presently organizing under the approved policies with respect to the postwar National Guard and Reserve, as approved by the then Secretary of War on October 13, 1945, and the troop basis prepared by the War Department General Staff to implement the approved policies, which created an over-all troop basis of 682,000 as a result of those policies——

Mr. COLE. All right.

General CRAMER. That is Army and Air National Guard.

Mr. COLE. Then drop down to subparagraph (c), General, and tell me to what extent this bill authorizes increases for the Organized Reserve Corps?

General BRADLEY. As I understand it, there is no limit at the present time in the Organized Reserve Corps. The number of people participating on an active-duty status has been controlled by legislation and by the desire of the Reserve officers themselves to stay abreast of training.

Mr. COLE. And heretofore there has been no ceiling on the inactive Reserve Corps?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. COLE. The Organized Reserve Corps on inactive duty.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me if it is true, as it appears to be, that this bill authorizes a 60-percent increase in the authorized strength of the National Guard, there should be some explanation in justification of it, either by General Bradley or somebody else.

General BRADLEY. If you will remember, the authorized strength of the Regular Army under the National Defense Act was approximately 280,000. We do not believe that that meets modern conditions. Neither do we believe that the authorized strength of 425,000 for the National Guard meets the requirements of the present world conditions and our position of leadership in it. We believe that that would be too restrictive for mobilization purposes, without having to come to you again for further authorization upon the happening of even minor emergency which might cause us to increase forces. We believe both of those figures are outdated by present conditions.

Mr. COLE. The 425,000, or 450,000 ceiling now existing for the National Guard was established by the Defense Act of 1920, do I understand?

General BRADLEY. As amended, yes. I don't remember when the last amendment to that was.

Do you know, General Cramer?

General CRAMER. The original strength was included in the 1920 act.

Mr. COLE. When was the 425,000, or 450,000 ceiling enacted?

General CRAMER. That was enacted in 1920—425,000 enlisted men.

Mr. COLE. What was the statutory strength of the Army in 1920?

General BRADLEY. The authorized strength in the National Defense Act was 280,000, sir.

Mr. COLE. 280,000 for the Regulars?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. And 425,000, or 450,000, for the National Guard?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. So the increase now requested for the National Guard, from 450,000 to 780,000, is substantially less than the proportionate increase heretofore established for the Regular Army up to 837,000?

General BRADLEY. Yes; percentagewise, it is less.

The CHAIRMAN. General Dahlquist, will you come around, please, sir. I want to ask you a few questions.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, before he leaves the subject of the raising of the National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HÉBERT. General, wasn't it necessary to place a ceiling on the National Guard enlistments at the time of the enactment of the draft law?

General BRADLEY. Yes; because of the amount of appropriations we had for this fiscal year.

Mr. HÉBERT. That was the only necessity for the ceiling. You had enough personnel authorized to take care of those who wished to enlist in the National Guard?

General BRADLEY. Yes.

Mr. HÉBERT. Now, what is your opinion on the present ruling that anybody enlisting in the National Guard now should be exempt from the draft? Will that demand a further increase in the ceiling of your personnel in the National Guard?

General BRADLEY. We expect to get—put it this way: We hope to get appropriations for an increase in the National Guard for 1950.

But that is a rather difficult question to answer; just how much effect the possibility of a draft has upon a man enlisting in the National Guard.

Mr. HÉBERT. Well, of course, the increase in the National Guard enlistment occurs when the exemption is granted to a prospective draftee. Would your opinion be that that figure of 750,000 would be saturated or absorbed if you receive appropriations to sustain such a National Guard?

General BRADLEY. I doubt very much whether you could ever reach that figure under present conditions. And we had no intention of asking for funds for that much of an increase.

Mr. HÉBERT. You doubt if they would reach that figure in spite of the fact that such people would be exempt from the draft if they enlisted in the National Guard?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir; I doubt that.

Mr. HÉBERT. There would still be some who would prefer to be drafted than go into the National Guard?

General BRADLEY. They would be willing to take their chances, certainly.

Mr. HÉBERT. That is what I mean.

Mr. BROOKS. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Brooks.

Mr. BROOKS. In increasing these figures, would we be able to get the States interested in proceeding to increase the Guard in the local States to the point of taking up the personnel that we want them to take up?

General BRADLEY. I am not quite sure I get the import of your question.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, naturally the States make a contribution to the Guard.

Let me ask you this question: Will the several States be interested in building the Guard to the size that you want it increased?

General BRADLEY. I believe General Dahlquist can probably answer that question better than I can because he has been a little closer to that particular point.

Mr. BROOKS. He is an old guardsman himself and I am sure he knows about that.

General DAHLQUIST. Actually, this does not provide for any more units than we now have, that the States already have accepted. The acceptance, as I understand it, by the States of the present troop basis was predicated on two assumptions: One was that they would have help in recruiting, if necessary, and that they would get substantial help in the building of facilities because I doubt that the States have accepted the present troop basis under the assumption that they are going to furnish the funds for the armories and storage facilities.

Mr. BROOKS. Don't you have complaints now from some of the States that the Guard is as large as they want it to be?

General DAHLQUIST. I personally do not know of any. General Cramer, who is Chief of the National Guard Bureau, would have the answer on that, as to whether States are objecting to the present allocation, or not.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, it would be natural to expect them to say that a certain strength would be sufficient for their own needs; wouldn't it?

General DAHLQUIST. I don't believe the present troop basis is on a State need. I believe it is far in excess of what the States need for their own purposes.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, the present troop basis for the Guard is above, you say, the statutory limitation.

General DAHLQUIST. The statutory limitation is not on the number of troops but on the number of men. For instance, we could have with the present authorization of men the same number of troops that are now allocated, but the companies would be smaller, the regiments would be smaller, and the divisions would be smaller.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, isn't your personnel above the statutory limitation now?

General DAHLQUIST. No, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. I thought that General Bradley just said it was 440,000.

General DAHLQUIST. That is the statutory limitation. The number of men we have is under 350,000.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, it is?

General DAHLQUIST. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. You are still well below that limit.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the exact strength of the active National Guard at the end of last year—December 31, 1948?

General DAHLQUIST. I think General Cramer can answer that.

General CRAMER. I can give you the figures, sir, as of January 15: Between 317,000 and 318,000 officers and warrant officers and enlisted men in the Army National Guard and the Air National Guard.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, is there any contemplated expansion in any of the States of that number?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir. The limitations fixed by the budget for the fiscal year 1949 imposed a limitation on the Army National Guard of 300,000 and on the Air National Guard of 41,000. It is anticipated that those figures will be reached.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to say right here, General Cramer, last spring I had a little communication with General Bradley about the National Guard in my State of California, and in that communication I criticized an officer. And somebody that read that felt that I was aiming at you. I wasn't thinking of you at all.

In fact, I want to say for the record that my people in my State, including The Adjutant General, think you are the best one we have ever had on the job.

General CRAMER. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General Dahlquist, this question will be asked on the floor, and this is for information, and the record: What is the strength of the Army today? Is it 682,000?

General DAHLQUIST. The last strength figure I had was 682,000 officers and men.

The CHAIRMAN. And the budget put a limitation on the strength of about 677,000?

Digitized by Google

General DAHLQUIST. We must enter next fiscal year with a strength of 677,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, with an Army of either 682,000 or 677,000, what is the total number of officers you have? Is it 72,936?

General DAHLQUIST. I got the figure here. I am sorry I don't remember. That is approximately correct.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest when you discuss the figures that you are now discussing you make certain that you mean Regulars or Regulars including Reserves.

The CHAIRMAN. We will do that.

Now, on active duty, how many officers have you today? Is it 72,936?

Well, anyway, that is what you furnished me.

General DAHLQUIST. I have the exact figures. That is approximately correct.

The CHAIRMAN. There were a series of questions sent to the Department. And this is merely for the record. These questions will be asked and I want to be in a position to advise the House if anyone asks me.

One of them is this: Give the number of officers in each grade, permanent and temporary. In the Regular Army, you furnished me the information that there are 22,018 officers; called to active duty was 50,918, which I assume would be Reserve officers—making a total of 72,936. That is approximately correct, isn't it?

General DAHLQUIST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Good.

I will put in the record the break-down, in grades.

(The break-down, in grades, is as follows:)

U. S. Army officer command strength, by grade in which serving, Nov. 30, 1948

Grade	Male commissioned and WAC		Nurses and WMSC
Commissioned officers	67,778	(1,472)	4,382

Warrant officer (junior grade)	1,379	(12)	.....

NOTE.—Figures in parentheses represent Air Force personnel.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I would like to get this information for the record:

Give the number of civilian employees in the Department of the Army. You answered there were 13,835 civilian employees assigned to the Department of the Army in Washington, D. C., as of November 1, 1948.

Digitized by Google

Give the number of civilian employees of the Army in the United States. You answered 305,465 civilian employees were assigned to the Department of the Army in the United States as of November 1, 1948.

Now, are there any other questions on the proposed amendment to section 102 by any of the members of the committee?

Mr. KILDAY. May I ask this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. General Bradley, I notice that in the bill the Army title of the bill includes the Reserve and National Guard. The Air Force title of the bill does not refer to the Reserve and National Guard. The bill is primarily to fix the strength of the Regular forces. Can you explain to me now why the Army has included the limitations on the strength of the National Guard and the Reserve in the bill?

General BRADLEY. Well, we believe we should have some figure for planning purposes. You had an authorization, for example, for the National Guard in the old National Defense Act. It apparently was thought necessary. This will remove any doubt, if we put in the authorized strength of the National Guard, so that we can use that figure for planning purposes. In other words, you might think that you still had to stick to the old 425,000 provided in the old Defense Act.

Mr. KILDAY. This is to act as a revision of the old 425,000 authorization of the Defense Act. But there was no limitation on the Reserve and now you bring in a limitation on the Reserve. Could you tell us why you now feel it is necessary to put a limitation on the Reserve?

General BRADLEY. I don't suppose there is any great necessity for it, but we believe that it is in accordance with good planning. Since we have an authorized strength for the other two we should have some figure for planning purposes for the Reserve also.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, this contemplates only a ceiling whereas at the present time there is no ceiling.

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. I notice for the first time this bill proposes to grant authority for warrant officers in the Reserve. There has been no such authority in the past, as I understand it.

General BRADLEY. That is correct. We thought they should be placed on the same basis and footing as the Regular Army and National Guard.

Mr. KILDAY. And then if this bill is passed you propose to go ahead with the Reserve warrant officer program?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, may I just get one thing clear in my mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hébert.

Mr. HÉBERT. General Bradley, as I understood you a moment ago, in connection with the ceiling placed on the National Guard of 750,000, as contrasted to the enforcement of the draft law, the situation as it confronts us now would be that the 750,000 ceiling would be enough to absorb any individual who is subject to the draft and desired to join the National Guard in order to avoid being drafted. So it brings us for all intents and purposes to the fact that the draft means that only those who will allow themselves to be drafted will be drafted; is that correct?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. Well, as I understand it now, your draft is suspended, I think for 2 months; isn't it?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. HÉBERT. Also, you have a ruling now that if an individual who is subject to the draft joins the National Guard he then is exempt from the draft.

The CHAIRMAN. They would have to do it within a certain length of time.

Mr. HÉBERT. No, sir; they just revised that, Mr. Chairman.

General DAHLQUIST. The selective-service law provided that anybody who was in the guard on the date of enactment of the act, regardless of his age or any other condition, was exempt from calling under the draft.

The act further provided when any governor says he is unable to maintain the strength of his guard by voluntary enlistment of men who are eligible he could then enlist men below the age of 18 years and 6 months, and they would be deferred from induction so long as they stayed in the guard.

Mr. HÉBERT. Yes.

General DAHLQUIST. There is nothing in the Selective Service Act which prevents men joining the guard. But men who were not deferrable under other provisions of the law, when their number came up and if men were being inducted, and who enlisted after enactment of the act, would have been inducted.

But, of course, there are several millions of veterans who are not subject to the draft. Men who have families are not subject to the draft.

Mr. HÉBERT. General, within the last several weeks the order was issued that any individual who joined the guard, despite the fact that he joined after the day of enactment of the draft law, would be exempt from the draft. I think that is the practice in force right now, if I am not mistaken.

I am trying to arrive at that conclusion, that the draft law for all intents and purposes is dead.

General DAHLQUIST. I am not acquainted with the order you are talking about. Perhaps General Cramer is.

The CHAIRMAN. Come around, General.

Mr. HÉBERT. That is the one thing I am trying to arrive at. For all intents and purposes there is no draft right now, except on the books.

General CRAMER. The gentleman, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, is correct, on a ruling by the Director of Selective Service.

Mr. HÉBERT. So for all intents and purposes the draft is dead, except being on the books.

General BRADLEY. No, sir; we wouldn't agree to that statement.

Mr. HÉBERT. But you are not drafting anybody, General.

General BRADLEY. No, sir; but if we fall below strength and can't get them by voluntary means, then we would have to issue another call.

Mr. HÉBERT. Then you would revoke the present existing ruling of the Selective Service Director.

General BRADLEY. Not necessarily so.

85266—49—No. 12——4

Digitized by Google

General DAHLQUIST. There has been no order that we issued. Selective Service may have issued a ruling, which he may revoke at some future time.

Mr. HÉBERT. All right.

General DAHLQUIST. We have no control over the administration of the law.

Mr. HÉBERT. In other words, you give your quota to the Selective Service Director, and he has to fill it.

General DAHLQUIST. That is correct.

Mr. HÉBERT. And it is within his province to issue whatever rulings he desires. But he must keep within the number required.

General DAHLQUIST. And he must keep within the provisions of the law also.

Mr. HÉBERT. Naturally. I understand that.

Mr. KILDAY. How many governors have taken advantage of that provision, that they could issue that certificate? Have any exercised it?

General CRAMER. When I checked the figures some time ago it was in the thirties. Then when we lifted the ceiling on recruiting in the National Guard, on the 23d day of November, several other governors took advantage of the provision to which General Dahlquist has made reference. So I should say it is in effect at least in two-thirds of the States, and probably more.

I can give you the exact number, if you would like that figure.

The CHAIRMAN. Members of the committee, is there any objection to agreeing to the proposed amendment as submitted by the Department of the Army to section 102?

If not——

Mr. COLE. None, except that I have a little amendment that I discussed with the general yesterday, and to which he had no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. COLE. And that is, at the bottom of page 3, in section 102 (a), where you refer to—one-year enlisted volunteers for training as are authorized by Congress—to change that to read—

one year enlistees as are or may be authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your comment, General Bradley, in reference to the amendment by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Cole?

General BRADLEY. May I get that a little bit more accurately?

Mr. COLE. After the words "one year"——

General BRADLEY (reading):

Exclusive of such one year——

Mr. COLE (reading):

one-year enlistees as are or may be authorized by law.

General BRADLEY. That is all right with us.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, Mr. Cole's amendment is agreed to, and, without objection, section 102, as amended and proposed by the Department.

Now, we will take section 103, General.

Let the staff representative read section 103. Mr. Blandford.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

The proposed amendment to section 103, is as follows [reading]:

SEC. 103. The Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to procure the materials and facilities, including guided missiles, necessary for the maintenance and support of the Army of the United States and its organizations and installations, including but not limited to: (1) the supply of modern standard items of equipment; (2) the replacement of equipment as it becomes obsolete or unserviceable; (3) the provision of necessary spares and spare parts; and (4) the maintenance of such reserves of supplies and equipment as are necessary for the Army to perform its mission.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, any comments you want to make with regard to the proposed amendment to section 103?

General BRADLEY. I might say in its present form section 103 provides for the modernized equipment for six divisions each year. That was the way it was originally printed.

This program had been considered essential for the maintenance of modern equipment both for the Regular Army and its Reserve components. It is part of the authority required by the Army for the procurement and supply of equipment and facilities necessary to the accomplishment of its mission.

However, because this requirement for six annual sets of division equipment was based upon the authorized strength of the Army rather than the strength actually provided for in annual budgets, we would recommend elimination of this provision.

As a result, the revised section 103 proposes only generally and in broad flexible terms for the initial supply, replacement, maintenance, and reserves of materials and facilities for the Army to be appropriated by the Congress in any fiscal year. In other words, we have eliminated what might have been an onerous tax burden to be carried from year to year.

And we believe that the section in these general terms is better than putting it in the specific terms as it was originally printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions from any members of the committee on the proposed amendment to section 103?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston, of Ohio.

Mr. ELSTON. General, I am wondering why you include guided missiles and do not refer to atomic weapons?

General BRADLEY. Well, we do not enter into the procurement of atomic weapons. That is controlled and done by the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. ELSTON. Yes, I understand; but the Army can request them.

General BRADLEY. In case of an emergency, whichever service was going to use them would then get authority from higher authority than ourselves for their use, and then they would be turned over to that service for use. That would apply to any one of the three services.

Mr. ELSTON. You think this section is sufficiently broad to cover the procurement of atomic weapons without specifically referring to them, since you have specifically referred to guided missiles.

General BRADLEY. I think it is sufficiently broad because even in case of an emergency the procurement of the atomic weapons would still be by the Atomic Energy Commission and be turned over to us for use.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the first time any direct authorization has been written in the law relating to guided missiles; is it not?

Digitized by Google

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. It gives it a separate positive place in appropriations.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman—if the gentleman will yield on the point which he has raised, which I think is very important.

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. COLE. Would this language permit you to obtain all the facilities necessary for the use of the atomic weapon but not including the weapon itself?

General BRADLEY. I think it does. In its broad terms it says:

 * * is hereby authorized to procure the materials and facilities, including guided missiles, necessary for the maintenance and support of the Army of the United States and its organizations and installations, including but not limited to— four items.

Mr. COLE. I suggest you have your staff give some thought to that question, and if there is any doubt in your mind that that be clarified by appropriate language later on.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. We thought it was inclusive, but if there is any question about it we will restudy it and see whether or not it should have the wording changed.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. General Bradley, directing your attention to subdivision (4) of that section, it reads as follows:

the maintenance of such reserves of supplies and equipment as are necessary for the Army to perform its mission.

I wish you would elaborate on that a little bit and tell us what you had in mind.

What I am thinking of is this: Does that include stock piling or is that only the reserve you want for the various units?

General BRADLEY. This does not apply to stock piling of strategic materials.

We had left over from the war varying amounts of equipment of various types. We would like to rehabilitate that and store it and maintain it for future use either by units or as a reserve material for units that happen to be in combat.

Mr. JOHNSON. This doesn't affect the Stock-piling Act that we passed here several years ago in any way?

General BRADLEY. This does not apply to stock piles.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. General, does this give you any authority to dispose of this obsolete and unserviceable equipment?

General BRADLEY. This does not. That already exists by law.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. In other words, it does not change the existing law.

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The main purpose, as I understand it, of this section is to make it beyond any question of a doubt that the Appropriations Committee has specific authority to make various appropriations with reference to that matériel and they would not be subject to a point of order.

General BRADLEY. That is our understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. One more question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. Do you think it can be construed to include the acquisition of real estate?

General BRADLEY. I should think the word "facilities" there would include that.

Mr. ELSTON. Then, would it include the disposition of real estate?

As I understand it now, the Army comes in, if they have some real estate to dispose of, or if they have to grant an easement over real estate, and have to request specific authority from Congress. Do you think that might dispense with the necessity of requesting that authority in the future?

General BRADLEY. I will let General Reeder answer that question, if I may.

General REEDER. We are requesting separate and distinct legislation to cover the disposal of real estate.

As to easements, we do have authority, in the Secretary of War, to grant easements.

We do not have any general authority to dispose of real estate when it is no longer needed, or to exchange real estate except by specific authorization of Congress.

Mr. ELSTON. I understand, then, you are going to ask for that in some subsequent bill?

General REEDER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, any other questions on the amendment to section 103?

If not, section 103, as amended, is agreed to by the committee.

Now, go to section 104. I will let the staff representative read it.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Section 104: Research and development authorization, has not been amended by the Army and the original bill remains the same. [Reading:]

The Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to conduct, engage, and participate in research and development programs related to activities of the Army of the United States and to procure or contract for the use of, such facilities, equipment, services, and supplies as may be required to effectuate such programs.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I am glad to note that out of four sections that were drafted by the Armed Services Committee we were able to get one without it being rewritten. We did pretty well.

Any objection to agreeing to section 104?

Mr. COLE. I have a question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. I want to raise this question with regard to the authority given to the Department of the Army with respect to research. To what extent does this section nullify the authority and responsibility given to the Research and Development Board by the National Military Act of 1947?

General BRADLEY. It does not affect theirs at all. It merely authorizes the Army to carry on research projects. As a matter of fact, at the present time, there is no specific statutory authority for these activities.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COLE. Well, would there be any objection to putting a limitation in section 104 to the extent that the Secretary's authority with respect to research, which in my opinion is necessary and proper, be exercised in accordance and under the provisions of the National Military Establishment Act of 1947?

General BRADLEY. It might lead to difficulties if you did put restrictions in it.

I assure you that all of these research programs are coordinated now and watched over by the Research and Development Board.

Mr. COLE. Yes, but you see we have this situation: The Congress, and with the approval of the President, enacted into law a special agency which was charged with the responsibility of coordinating the research that was done by the military departments of the Military Establishment.

Now, if the Congress subsequent to the enactment of that law gives specific authority to one of the departments with respect to research, it could be very properly argued that that nullified the authority of the Research and Development Board with respect to that particular department.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not put it in cooperation with the Research Board?

Mr. COLE. That is what I have in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Don't exclude, just put it in cooperation with them.

General BRADLEY. Well, section 302, which follows, is a saving provision which I think would eliminate your objection on that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, when we get to section 302 there will be a good deal of discussion about that, because I think that goes further than we probably want to go.

I think the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Cole, is to have it in cooperation with the Research Board as set up in the National Security Act.

It might be interpreted, as written in section 104, as being separate and independent. I think it ought to be in cooperation with the Research Board as set up in the National Security Act.

General BRADLEY. It is all right with us.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the staff, then, if there is no objection, prepare an amendment to the effect that the Secretary of the Army, in cooperation with the Research Board, as provided for in this National Defense Act, can conduct, engage, and participate in research.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest it read substantially as follows:

Subject to the provisions of section 214 of the National Security Act of 1947, the Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to conduct—and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. It is all right.

General BRADLEY. It is all right with us, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Now, members of the committee, that finishes all the sections relating to the Army—wait.

Without objection, the amendments agreed to on the Army section of the bill are agreed to.

Now, General Bradley——

Mr. COLE. Does that include section 105?

The CHAIRMAN. No. These others relate to the Air Force, except section 302, which is over-all.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COLE. There is a new section 105 that the Army is proposing.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes. Read this section 105.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

SEC. 105. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title. Except as may otherwise be provided in the appropriation act concerned (1) any moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of section 103 of this Act shall remain available for obligation during the fiscal year for which appropriated, and for the succeeding fiscal year, and shall remain available for expenditure for a total of five years; and (2) any moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of section 104 shall remain available until expended.

Mr. KILDAY. I just wanted to know whether there has been any study given to the constitutional question involved there as to appropriations for the Army in excess of a period of 2 years?

General REEDER. Yes, sir; there has. I can't quote the opinions of the Attorney General, but the substance is that in the constitutional limitation the gear and material to equip an army and operate it is not included. The language of the Constitution says—

* * * to raise and support the Army—

and that has been held and is held to mean that Congress can by its action limit the Army within that 2-year provision by the pay and the appurtenances of the individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this has more application to a program for the Air Force than it would to the Army because the Army would hardly engage in a procurement program for as long a period as 5 years in reference to tanks and artillery and small arms. They can be manufactured with such rapidity that they can probably be made within a period of 2 years. But it would have direct bearing upon an orderly procurement program with reference to aviation. That is the reason for it. It refers to both departments.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the general as to the effects of the decision of the Attorney General and the Adjutant General. It does not apply to equipment but to pay and subsistence of the armed services.

But I think we ought to put it in the hearings, because the question is likely to arise.

The CHAIRMAN. Put the opinions in the hearing.

General REEDER. We will get those opinions.

(The opinions are as follows:)

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, LOGISTICS DIVISION,
GENERAL STAFF, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington 25, D. C., February 1, 1949.

Memorandum for Chief, Legislative and Liaison Division.
Subject: Army and Air Force Act of 1949.

Reference our telephone conversation of this date concerning questions with respect to the Army and Air Force Act of 1949, the following is furnished:

Question. Does section 103 cover atomic weapons? Answer. Subject to the provisions of other laws, now in existence or that may be enacted, it is believed that section 103 covers atomic weapons.

Question. Are the provisions of section 105 in conflict with article I, section 8, clause 12, of the Constitution? Answer. An opinion of the Attorney General on January 2, 1904 (vol. 25, Opinions of the Attorney General, p. 105) states that: "The inhibition of article I, section 8, clause 12 of the Constitution is confined to appropriations to raise and support armies in the strict sense of the word 'support,' and does not extend to appropriations for the various means which an army may use in military operations, or which are deemed necessary for common defense."

In an opinion of January 8, 1948, the Attorney General ruled that "There appears to be no legal objection to a request to the Congress to appropriate funds to the Air Force for the procurement of aircraft and aeronautical equipment to remain available until expended" (vol. 40, Op. No. 132). This opinion was based upon the previous opinion rendered by Solicitor General Hoyt on January 2, 1904 (25 Op. No. 105).

Question. Has that portion of section 105 which states "Except as may otherwise be provided in the appropriation act concerned" been checked with the Comptroller General? Answer. Yes. The Comptroller General has stated that in the absence of specific provisions in appropriation legislation, the language contained in the authorization legislation will apply.

W. O. REEDER,
Major General, GSC,
Deputy Director for Commands and Services, Logistics Division.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the final sentence of that section shouldn't be in the bill at all because it is an invasion by this committee of a field over which we have no jurisdiction whatever. And that fact is set forth in the language itself. It says:

* * * except as may otherwise be provided in the Appropriations Act concerned.

Except as the Appropriations Committee recommendation may be adopted by Congress then we say this shall be thus and so, which I feel is something that this committee should be very careful about doing for fear of invading a responsibility and a prerogative of another committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't see how that invades the prerogative of the Appropriations Committee. The Appropriations Committee can only make appropriations on a program that has been authorized.

Mr. COLE. All right, then take out that first expression at the beginning of the sentence. Don't admit that the other committee has authority to modify what this committee recommends.

The CHAIRMAN. You may be on sound ground with reference to that.

Of course, the legislative authority is what the Appropriations Committee is guided by and if the legislative authority is that it is the intent of the Congress to make appropriations over a period of time, then they so write their bill in accordance with that legislative authority.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, on that point, as I understand it, this is not absolute authority, but it simply authorizes the Appropriations Committee, if they see fit to do so——

The CHAIRMAN. That is right, exactly.

Mr. ELSTON. To make the appropriation last over a period of 2 to 5 years.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. In other words, the Appropriations Committee would have the complete and absolute authority to say whether or not the provisions of this proposed section 105 shall prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. COLE. You mean the Appropriations Committee would not have authority to grant this extension of time for the spending of the money without this authorization?

Mr. ELSTON. That is right. If they didn't have this authorization they couldn't do it.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. Otherwise, they couldn't lay down an orderly building program.

As a matter of fact, in the ship construction program this same principle has always applied, and it should apply in reference to this act because this act deals with both the Army and the Air Force.

Any questions now from the staff on any section of the bill?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

General, in the event that the Appropriations Committee does not otherwise specify how you may spend your money, of what force and effect would this language have in law as far as the Comptroller General is concerned? Supposing the Appropriations Committee does not insert any language indicating how you may spend this money over a long period of time?

General REEDER. Then this would apply.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Do you believe this would have any force and effect, as far as the Comptroller General is concerned?

General REEDER. That is right, sir. The statement is, "Except as may be otherwise provided."

Mr. BLANDFORD. That is a negative approach. In other words, if the Appropriations Committee does not say for how long that appropriation will be available, does this take the place of that language? You are sure of that, as far as these decisions of the Comptroller General are concerned?

General REEDER. No, not positive.

General BRADLEY. We haven't asked for an opinion on it, but the lawyers helped to write it.

Mr. BLANDFORD. I am raising this because it may come up on the floor.

Mr. ELSTON. Would the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. I am wondering whether the use of the word "shall" makes it mandatory that it be carried over for a total of 5 years, since the word "shall" in law is of a mandatory nature much more so than the word "may."

General REEDER. Yes, sir. That is the feeling I have. It is that this language applies except when the committee dictates otherwise.

General BRADLEY. You will notice that this provision is slightly different from the one the Air Force will want, because our problems, as you say, are not quite the same.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General BRADLEY. We would like to have, however, the authority to obligate these funds during that fiscal year, and the next one, because we are quite often in a position where we have to hurry contracts, and so forth, toward the end of the fiscal year and can't always do the best job. In addition to that, come June 30 we can't spend any money then until the new appropriations act for the following year is passed.

This would help us a great deal in procurement, if we could get it extended into the next fiscal year, although we do not feel that for that purpose we need it extended any more than just the year following the fiscal year for which appropriated.

Ths CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Elston, are you offering an amendment to substitute "may" for "shall"?

Mr. ELSTON. No; I think the word "shall" should remain. I simply make the point that since it says "shall remain," it means that it does carry for a period of 5 years unless the Appropriations Committee decides otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. Any objection to incorporating in the bill a new section to be known as section 105?

If not, the amendment as proposed by the Department of the Army is agreed to.

Now, General Bradley, that finishes all of your section of the bill, except section 302, which relates to both Departments. Let the staff read section 302. I would like an explanation of it.

Mr. BLANDFORD. In the amended bill, it will be section 301, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Mr. BLANDFORD. In the amended bill, it will be section 301.

The CHAIRMAN. The saving provisions.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, the authorizations herein contained shall be subject to the responsibilities, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what does that mean, General? What have you in mind, in putting that in?

General BRADLEY. The idea was to try to put a saving clause in here which would provide that this law or this bill would not upset the present laws pertaining to the duties of the Secretary of Defense.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, where in this bill do you find anything relating, except in this paragraph, to the Secretary of Defense? Or how can it be interpreted that this bill infringes in any way upon the powers given to the Secretary of Defense in the National Security Act, or any authority?

General BRADLEY. We put it in at the request of the Secretary of Defense.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; there is no doubt about that.

General BRADLEY. I don't know exactly what his reasons were.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I want to find out. That is probably what happened.

We will save the Secretary of Defense in his own act. We don't want to do it in this act, from my viewpoint, because Congress specifically designated certain powers to the Secretary of Defense. He has only certain limited jurisdiction, and they are enumerated: Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Now, I don't know what authority this would give him over your establishment.

As you said, it was put in at the behest and request of the Secretary of Defense. We better ask him what was the purpose and objective in having it put in.

General BRADLEY. I am sure he would be better qualified to answer that question than I.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; I think he will probably be in a better position than you.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that perhaps one of the reasons it was put in is an illustration which I brought the committee's attention to in connection with this research. The committee expressly wrote into the bill that the provisions of the bill we are now considering shall be subject to the provisions of the Military Establishment Act of 1947. Well, here is another instance. This bill gives the Secretary of the Army the authority to procure certain materials. Well, I don't think this committee means that the authority of the Secretary of the Army to procure materials should be superior to the coordinating responsibility of the Secretary of Defense.

I think it is for instances such as that that this so-called basing clause was put into the bill, to preserve the present statutory authority that the Secretary of Defense has over all of the departments.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, in view of General Bradley's statement that it was put in at the instance or request of the Secretary of Defense, I think probably he would be the one to make the inquiry about.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from New York has to say is particularly referable I think to section 202, subsection (3), where the Secretary of Defense is given the power to take appropriate steps to eliminate unnecessary duplication overlapping the field of procurement, supply, transportation, storage, health, and so forth.

But I am just wondering, inasmuch as this fixes the enlisted and officer strength of the Army and the Air Force, what effect this last provision here may have on the power that he had to allocate the officers and enlisted men of the services at the time of the divisions of the Army and the Air Force. Could it be construed as continuing the power of the Secretary of Defense in allocating the numbers of commissioned officers and enlisted personnel of the formerly combined Army and Air Force? If so, we don't want it in here because we are now specifically fixing the strength of each service.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we will take it up, Mr. Kilday, with Mr. Forrestal. We will call him up here and let him explain it, or someone from his staff to explain it.

Now, members of the committee, this finishes with all sections of the bill relating to the Army. What is the pleasure of the committee as to approval of all sections of the bill, as amended, exclusive of section 302, relating to the Army?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I feel that the sections we are about to approve concern the National Guard. When are we going to give the National Guard an opportunity to have something to say?

The CHAIRMAN. If you had been here when the gavel fell this morning, you would have found the first witness was General Reckord, who approved it for the National Guard. The National Guard, I am glad to say, is in thorough accord with the amendments as now being voted on.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, what about the Reserves? Have we heard from the Reserves? I feel before we approve the bill we ought to hear from some member of the Reserves. General Evans is here——

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

I see nothing in the Reserve section except the number.

Mr. BROOKS. That is very important.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't imagine, in view of the generosity as to the number set in the bill, there is any hesitancy on the part of accepting it.

Digitized by Google

Now, General, do you want to make a statement?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Come right around.

General RECKORD. I would like to invite the attention of the chairman to the fact that we agreed to the one section which General Bradley was speaking to at the time. We were very careful to say that we agreed to the language of that section as changed.

Now, if you will permit me the only other suggestion we have to make with respect to the Army side is to clarify the expression "facilities" in section 103, the point being, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see. Wait one minute, General.

Section 103, in the amendments. Where is it?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General RECKORD. We would like to have the committee favorably consider adding the words, after the word "including," "armories and"—those two words—and the reason for that is that the Appropriations Committee does not consider the word "facilities" sufficiently broad to include any assistance in the construction of armories by the States.

The approved War Department policies were based upon the fact that assistance would be given the States in the construction of armories needed to house the additional strength over and above what the States needed.

And last year we thought we had added to the appropriation act for this fiscal year we are now in, I think it was 32½ million dollars. When we attempted to spend that on a basis of 50–50 or 25–75 allocation with the States themselves, we found that the word "facilities" in their opinion did not include armories. And it meant that we have lost 1 year in spending a total of some perhaps $75,000,000 on needed armory construction, the States sitting by with dollars in the banks which cannot be matched by Federal funds because of the fact that that one word is not in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, under this amendment that you propose, as I interpret it, the Appropriations Committee could make appropriation for the establishment of armories.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Which would be supplemented with State funds.

General RECKORD. State funds.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, it would give absolutely to the Appropriations Committee the authority specifically to designate in what States and what places they would establish the armories.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, of course, General, I am very anxious, and we are all very anxious to have armories, and all that, but money is a little short up here, and the most important thing in my mind is equipment. If we are going to use up all our money to build armories, where are we going to get our equipment?

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, by adding these two words you would not add one dollar to the appropriation act. If the money isn't appropriated, we couldn't spend it.

The CHAIRMAN. I know that, of course.

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, the National Defense Act gives the authority for the location of every National Guard unit to the governor of the State.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I know that, but it doesn't give opportunity to begin to build armories in all the localities where you have National Guard units.

Of course, you do need armories. We all agree on that.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are asking us to confer upon the Appropriations Committee the authority to make specific appropriations for any armory it sees fit in the appropriating meeting.

General RECKORD. No; I am not asking that it be specific like that.

The CHAIRMAN. They will do it in one or two ways: Either leave the discretion with the Department to locate the armories or locate them themselves.

General RECKORD. The way that would work, Mr. Chairman, is that the money appropriated would be allocated by the Department of the Army to the Chief of the National Guard Bureau, and he would deal with the States.

The CHAIRMAN. Thit is right, exactly.

General RECKORD. The States would match the money, and we would get the armory.

In my own little State of Maryland, because of the increased number of units over the number we had previous to World War II, we had to go into 10 different communities. Those units are organized, functioning, and passing their Federal inspections except for their facilities. Their facilities in some instances are disgraceful. It is the same all over the United States.

The State of California is sitting with millions of dollars in the banks and waiting for this authority, so that we can build double the number of armories or maybe three times the number of armories the States can build.

The CHAIRMAN. How many State legislatures have already made specific appropriations and laid down a matching program for armories?

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, I don't believe there is a single State that has laid down a maximum program. In my own State of Maryland, I have at the moment——

The CHAIRMAN. I said matching program. In other words——

General RECKORD. On matching program?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General RECKORD. I think quite a few have.

Now, in my own State, we are holding in the bank three-quarters of a million dollars that are not appropriated for matching purposes, but we are holding it for that purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, General, I want to be fair with you. I think the only way to proceed is to put the cards on the table. As far as I am concerned, I am thoroughly in accord with the principles.

I think it is a matter that should be separately considered and not tied in with this bill. And, representing your association, if you prepare a bill, I will assure you that we will have a hearing immediately on it. We will go into the whole question and deal with it separately and alone.

Digitized by Google

Now, this committee up to date hasn't been furnished with a great many departmental bills, and if we don't sort of look around for a little legislation we will run out of soap. So if you will furnish that, why, we will go to work on it. Let us not try to do everything in one bill. Let us have 2 days in here, instead of 1 day.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get into the record, if I may, the fact that 3 years ago this matter was proposed by the War Department. A year and a half ago we all got together on a bill that everybody agreed upon, and the bill isn't down here yet.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; you bring it up here and I will introduce it.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is that satisfactory now, General?

General RECKORD. Everything is satisfactory that will get us some money.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait 1 minute now.

Is it satisfactory for you to have a special, separate hearing on it?

General RECKORD. I am going to do whatever the chairman says.

The CHAIRMAN. I request you to prepare an armory bill for our consideration. We will give you a hearing the day you introduce it.

General RECKORD. But, Mr. Chairman, that puts the Guard in a very embarrassing position.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, we will have the staff to do it. Let the staff prepare the bill, in consultation with the Guard.

General RECKORD. The addition of these two words will solve the problem.

The CHAIRMAN. I am informed there is a bill all ready for us.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, isn't it possible, too, that the bill cover the entire armory program; for instance, a program covering the Guard and the Reserves in all of its phases—the Army Reserves, the Navy Reserves, the Air Force Reserves, and the Organized Reserves, as well as the National Guard—so we can have some order in connection with it?

General RECKORD. We have had a bill that we all agreed to for a year and a half now, and we can't get it pried out of the Pentagon.

The CHAIRMAN. You will get it this time.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask, Is it not true that we introduced a bill in the Eightieth Congress on the armory question, and the Department took an adverse position on it.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir. Then they changed their minds. We all got together. Now, I am told, within the last 3 or 4 days, that it is tied up in the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. BATES. General, under what provisions of law did the Naval Reserve armory bill——

General RECKORD. They have authority.

Mr. BATES. I know. Was that a general bill or a special bill?

General RECKORD. No, sir. That was authority that the chairman was instrumental in getting for the Navy when he was chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. We are going to equalize everything up here. Everything we did for the Navy we are going to do now for the Army and Air Force. We will get along all right.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General Evans, representing the Organized Reserve.

General EVANS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hesitate to interject myself in this situation that has just taken place under the circumstances, but I rose to my feet with the hope that I might bolster up General Reckord's suggestion that the words "armory and" be placed in this particular section.

We are in dire need of some sort of organization that will allow people to consider a temporary construction and the leasing of buildings.

The Reserve is in a much worse shape from that standpoint than the guard. I won't enter into a long discussion on the matter, but I would urgently urge that this committee consider putting in those words.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. BROOKS. Do you want General Reckord's bill to include the Reserve?

Mr. EVANS. I most certainly would.

The CHAIRMAN. You are satisfied with the numbers put in this bill?

General EVANS. Yes, I see no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General EVANS. Of course, the matter of numbers does not make a reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, I understand that. But you have to have some objective. That is your objective.

You are satisfied with that objective?

General EVANS. I am satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Anything further you desire to say with reference to it now?

General EVANS. No, not at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. I assure you, if the committee so directs me, we will have a hearing on the armory bills that are pending before us. I will ask the policy committee whether they want to have it heard before the full committee, or have one of the subcommittees work on it. We will go to work on it right away, because we haven't much grist in the mill.

General EVANS. I should also like to have an opportunity at not too long a time—and at your discretion, of course—to discuss with the committee the question of the Reserve itself, as to its organization, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. There is a good deal of legislation that has been introduced. It has been submitted to the departments for their comments. We will afford that privilege to you, too.

General EVANS. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, what is your pleasure with reference to agreeing to this section of the bill as amended by the Department of the Army?

Without objection, that section of the bill is agreed to, excluding section 302.

Now, that brings us down to that portion of the bill known as the Air Force title.

General Bradley, I want to thank you, sir—and your staff as well—for your cooperation.

Digitized by Google

Is there any further information you want to give the committee in reference to that portion of the bill relating to your Department?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; except I may try to clear up one point that seemed to be causing trouble yesterday, if I might——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we have agreed to everything, so it didn't distrub us very much. We agreed to it like you wanted. You can clear it up in the record. That is all. We agreed to it just like you wrote it.

Now, members of the committee, we have reached that part of the bill which is title II, covering the Air Force. It is now 20 minutes after 11. The House is not in session. Well, let us go to work.

Mr. Secretary Symington, will you and your staff come around, please, sir.

If the news services want to make any pictures, you make them now. [Pictures taken.]

STATEMENT OF HON. W. STUART SYMINGTON, SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE, ACCOMPANIED BY GEN. HOYT VANDENBERG, CHIEF OF STAFF, AIR FORCE

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, we have under consideration H. R. 1437, the part of which dealing with the Army begin title I and title II dealing with the Air Force.

As you are Secretary of the Air Force, the committee would be delighted to have you make any statement that you desire with reference to that portion that fits your service.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a very short statement here, and if it meets with your approval I would like to read it and then if there are any questions I would be glad to answer them. General Vanderberg can take up some other aspects of the bill that he would like to bring up.

The Department of the Air Force appreciates the opportunity to appear here in support of this authorization bill.

I should like to briefly discuss the problems and programs of the Air Force in relation to the need for the enactment of this legislation. General Vandenberg and his deputies will provide that degree of detailed information you may wish concerning the Air Force. He and his staff are prepared to discuss with you our present capabilities as a fighting force and the effect which this legislation, when enacted into law, will have on the future of our Air Force.

The United States Air Force was created as an autonomous military service by the National Security Act of 1947; and it is now necessary to elaborate the nature and scope of the Air Force so created. To that end, the authority of definitive legislation is needed to provide guidance and continuity.

During the period just passed, and since the creation of the Air Force, our energy has in large part been devoted to placing in operation the first phase of the program developed from the findings of the President's Air Policy Commission and the Congressional Aviation Policy Board.

This legislation is designed to provide for the size and type of an Air Force which is the minimum required for national security. Considerable progress in planning and programing for the later phases has been accomplished. This type of long-range planning for national security has been debated, amended, and made an integral part of national policy through past actions by the Congress. I should like to emphasize here that legislation of this character is contained in the basic legislative program of the Secretary of Defense; and also that it has the approval in principle of the Secretary of the Army and of the Secretary of the Navy. The Navy Department already has such legislation.

The Bureau of the Budget has approved the desirability of this type of authorization bill setting up planning objectives for the military services.

The purpose of this legislation is to authorize an Air Force capable, in conjunction with the other armed services, of meeting whatever international crises might be forced upon this country.

In the atomic age of lightning attack, air power instantly capable of defense and sustained effective retaliatory attack is a basic need of the Nation. Without such capacity, when within a few years the one group of countries capable of attacking the United States will possess in quantity the absolute weapon, the lives of our people will be in daily jeopardy. That would not seem to be the proper heritage to leave our children.

At the present time the Navy alone among the three services has a statutory personnel ceiling. The military personnel strength of the Air Force and the Army is dependent upon the Selective Service Act of 1948. Establishment of the statutory military personnel authorization for the Army and the Air Force by enactment into law of this bill would create a framework within which these two services could plan and program on a reasonably firm, long-term basis.

Authorizations provided in this bill, including authorization for 24,000 aircraft, plus annual procurement authorization of 5,200 aircraft for replacement of unserviceable and obsolete types, and for the creation and maintenance of a serviceable war reserve, round out the provisions for personnel and aircraft.

Authorization for funds to be available until obligated and expended is also provided in this bill. This places long-range procurement and research planning upon a more businesslike basis.

I consider the passage of this authorization act essential to the security of the United States. If you have any questions, sir, I would be glad to answer them.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

I want to compliment you on your clear and concise statement.

I note you state this:

> This legislation is desired to provide for the size and type of an Air Force which is the minimum requirement for national security.

Section 201 of the bill says that the United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 air groups and 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by 61 Air Force Reserve groups, together with necessary supporting and auxiliary units.

In your prepared statement, you stated you felt that that was the type of Air Force which is the minimum required for national security: is that correct?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

85266—49—No. 12——5

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Would you please advise the committee if you have such a force today?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please inform the committee what type of Air Force you have today.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, at this time, sir, we have around 59 groups.

But in order that the position of the Air Force with respect to the new program is clear, which reduces that number to 48 groups, this is our position:

The Air Force and I, personally, have testified that we believe the 70-group program is the right program. The President in effect approves this because he authorizes us to have this legislation. Nevertheless, he does not feel that because of other world commitments it is possible at this time to have the money appropriated beyond the 48-group program and therefore the Air Force, which only sees that part of the program peculiar to the Military Establishment, supports the over-all program.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as I understand from your statement, all military authorities, including the Commander in Chief, agree that the maximum strength of the Air Force should be what is known as the 70 air group—that is, authorized.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would say, sir, that they approve the authorization of the 70 group.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right, they approve the authorization.

But on account of maintaining the economic security of the country they fear thay can only make money available to have it 45.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think 48, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-eight. That makes the issue clear, does it not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the conclusion to draw from that would be if we had the money then they would be supporting what you feel to be the minimum requirement, which would be a 70-group force.

Secretary SYMINGTON. From a military standpoint we agree to that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. From the standpoint——

The CHAIRMAN. The only question why we haven't a 70-group force is because of dollars and cents; that is, due to the money.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I saw in the budget, in reading it, where there were some $800,000,000 set aside for universal military training. I hardly think that the Congress is going to pass any universal military training bill this go-around. So the thought is running through my mind, in helping to sort of figure out where you can get the money, why wouldn't it be a good idea to use that $800,000,000 to try to carry out the objective which you all agree on, which is a 70-air-group. It would help that much, would it not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. You are asking me, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you needn't answer that, Mr. Secretary.

Mr. Brooks, any questions?

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Secretary, the present interim program for the Air Force, then, will constitute a scaling down, won't it, of what we have?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But in your long-range over-all program you still feel should be the 70-group?

Secretary SYMINGTON. When the country can afford the 70-group program from a military standpoint we believe it is wise; yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. What part—just briefly and in summary, without disclosing any military secrets—of the Air Force are you going to scale down?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Brooks, that is classified, sir. I have the answers here but I would prefer to give them to you in a closed hearing.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, is there anything that you can see in the foreign situation now which makes us breathe easier than we did last year when you were up here and when this committee felt that we should have a 70-group force?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, of course, I don't know much about the foreign situation, but I would say from what I know about it there is not much difference between it today and then.

Mr. BROOKS. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Secretary, did the President's Air Policy Commission make any recommendation with respect to the 70-air-group?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Your present recommendation of a 70 air-group is supported by a recommendation of the President's Air Policy Commission.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Is it supported by a determination of the congressional Aviation Policy Board?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Last year when we added $822,000,000 to the appropriations bill we made it available until 1952, if I remember correctly.

Now, on the question of an additional appropriation this year toward the accomplishment of a 70-air-group program, it would be carrying forward what we did last year, would it not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, if we do not go ahead and supply the funds to carry out the experimentation, development, and new production that is going on, don't we stand to lose money?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, what you would really be doing, Mr. Kilday, is you would be postponing—you get the authorization bill and you go ahead with the present program—the time when you would have the 70-group.

Mr. KILDAY. But if we can't carry that program on until 1952 in the anticipated appropriation for 70-group, we are bound to lose money on the amount of money we put up last year. What was the total? General Rawlings would know.

General RAWLINGS. $1,937,000,000.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. $1,937,000,000 we put up last year, and that was looking to the objective of 1952, having the 70-group in existence.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. So if we don't implement the appropriations we are bound to lose a percentage of the money we have already put up.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, I notice in the bill—you skipped a paragraph in your statement with reference to it, as to authorizing aircraft by numbers—section 203 authorizes 24,000 serviceable aircraft. Last year we were talking about air-frame pounds, if I remember correctly.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Has the Department changed its position as to the proper authorization now, that it ought to be by numbers rather than air-frame pounds?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We think that numbers is a better way to identify the Air Force. Air-frame weight is good from the standpoint of the industry as the primary identification, but from the standpoint of operating an Air Force the number of planes, in our opinion now, sir, is better than the estimate of total air-frame weight.

Mr. KILDAY. Have we said much when we say 24,000 planes without saying how many will be B–36's, let us say, or your F–80's, with the difference in the cost of the individual frame?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think when we define it in air-frame weight we get a little too restrictive on it as against the numbers of planes.

Mr. KILDAY. Then, this leaves it entirely to the Appropriations Committee to set the formation of the Air Force, because the number of the heavy planes you have, as compared to the lighter planes, is going to depend entirely upon the amount of money authorized or reported by the Appropriations Committee.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That would be true, sir. But the Joint Chiefs of Staff would agree on what type and character of groups we would have.

Mr. KILDAY. Well, you are going on with the development of the long-range strategic bomber.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Despite observations to the contrary we are; yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Well, how about the B–36? There has been a lot of criticism about it. What is the Air Force's position with reference to it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Kilday, I have been here for some years now, and I think the hatchet job that is being done, and has been done on the B–36 is the best hatchet job I have seen since I have been in town.

Mr. KILDAY. Well, you have seen some hatchet jobs.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

I would say this, that the B–36 today is the longest range and highest-flying airplane of its type in the world, and tomorrow—and specifically this year—will be the fastest bomber of that type.

We have some—I would rather not comment on it further, except to the committee in closed session. There will be a time when we would like to make considerable comment about that particular activity.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. But you would prefer the bill to have the number of groups, the number of personnel—officers and enlisted—and the number of planes, rather than the air-frame pounds, as previously?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bates.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Secretary, what is the amount in the budget to support the 48-group program?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Beg your pardon, sir?

Mr. BATES. What is the amount in the present budget that will support the 48?

Secretary SYMINGTON. $4,554,000,000.

That, however, Mr. Bates, does not include $400,000,000 for increased pay that is allocated to the Office of the Secretary of Defense and $430,000,000 that is allocated to the Office of Secretary of Defense for construction which he is to allocate between the services.

Then, also, sir, there is additional stock-piling figure, and there is also additional UMT figure.

Mr. BATES. How much more money would be necessary, say, to support the so-called 70-group program, over and above what is now in the budget?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Frankly, we haven't any detailed figures on that, but last year, based on what we figured we could support the development of the full 70-group program on, I think about 6½ billion.

General RAWINGS. At the level-off rate—in other words, when you hit the level—it would be 7½ billion dollars.

Mr. BATES. So there would be about three billion more for just the Air Force.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That chunk of money, which I think is $1,300,000,000, plus, in the Office of the Secretary of Defense to be allocated among the three Services, and whatever is given to the Air Force out of that contingency fund added to the 4½ billion—it would be the difference between that figure and the 6½ billion.

Mr. BATES. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Price?

Mr. PRICE. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Secretary, your reference to some hatchet work intrigues me. I am curious to have you tell us who is wielding the hatchet. I don't care about the individuals.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would be curious to know, myself, sir. We are doing our best to find out, and we would like to come before the committee if and when we do.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions, Mr. Cole?

Mr. COLE. No, except that doesn't clear up my mind very well.

To what were you referring when you said a hatchet job had been done?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, there have been a good many articles and letters written in criticism of the B-36. This week there have been broadcasts stating that the airplane was in effect no good. That is distressing to us because we think the airplane is an exceptionally good airplane.

Mr. COLE. Well, the identity of the people that wrote the letters and articles to which you refer must be known, is is not?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. We are attempting to find out. I would prefer not to get into the detail of it. I would be glad to discuss it with you, sir, and bring you all the evidence that we have to date at your convenience. Until we have the complete story we would rather not discuss it as a complete story.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Fisher, any questions?

Mr. FISHER. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Norblad.

Mr. NORBLAD. I would like to ask you about the Reserve program. I notice the Navy is setting up Reserve programs throughout the country, and so is the Army, and they are being set up purely independent of each other. It seems to me there would be a tremendous saving if they work together on their flights, instead of having independent bases and stations, and so forth. Could you comment on that, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, I was always, Mr. Norblad, for a law that put the Services closer together, and where those problems could be handled in what I would think a more businesslike fashion.

Mr. NORBLAD. Are you people working toward the end of consolidating or cooperating on your Reserve program? It seems to me you have been scattered throughout the country and with some consolidation there would be a tremendous saving.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I agree with you on that.

Mr. NORBLAD. Let me ask you about your active flying bases. To revert back to the well-known one here in Washington: The Bolling Field and Anacostia Field, and other duplications in the world—not as to your Reserve program but as to your active regular flying program—are you taking further steps to try to clear that up and consolidate those duplicating facilities?

Secretary SYMINGTON. You mean the Air National Guard and the Reserves?

Mr. NORBLAD. No. I am speaking of the Regular Establishment, where you have so many duplicating fields such as Bolling and Anacostia here in Washington.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That, of course, is a problem for the Secretary of Defense, sir, or the National Defense Establishment.

Mr. NORBLAD. That is being worked out, though?

Secretary SYMINGTON. It is being worked on. I think they have made some good progress, sir.

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Chairman, I just have one more question, if I may, and then I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. Take all the time you want.

Mr. NORBLAD. Thank you.

In the event the Congress were to abolish flight pay, there would be considerably more funds for building up the air-group program, would there not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We have averaged over three deaths a day since VJ-day in military airplanes. We might get a little more equipment if we abolished flying pay. In my opinion, we would also abolish morale in the Air Force and naval aviation at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. I might add that I don't think there is the slightest intention on the part of Congress to do that. We might look into the question of the higher echelon of it, but not as to the boys that do the actual flying.

Mr. Havenner, any questions?

Mr. HAVENNER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Doyle, any questions?

Mr. DOYLE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. deGraffenried?

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. No questions, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. What is the composition of the 48-group Air Force at the moment, from the standpoint of Regulars, Reserves, and National Guard?

Secretary SYMINGTON. It is not a 48-group program at the moment. It is more than that, but the groups aren't full.

At this time, Mr. Van Zandt, we have 411 000 all told—357,450 enlisted and 53,550 officers and warrant officers. That includes Regular and Reserve officers on active duty.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I see. That is for the 59-group.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is what we have now.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, if you cut it down to 48.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, those groups would be more complete. As a matter of fact, we would increase slightly. We would have 57,000 officers and 355,000 enlisted people, or a total of 412,000.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, without violating security, would it be possible for you to tell me the effect that the reduction from the 59-group to the 48-group will have upon the National Guard and the Reserves?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, when you get into the National Guard picture, the figures are as follows: Today in the National Guard we have 5,382 officers and 30,462 enlisted men. That is not what we would hope to get under the present program, including the 48-group. We would hope to get 7,911 officers and 50,327 enlisted.

I will give you those figures again: 5,382 officers, and we hope to have 7,911; 30,462 enlisted, and we hope to have 50,327.

Now, in the Reserve program we have decided that we are going to cut down very heavily in our Reserve picture as against what we have in order that we can concentrate on the reserves and make what we have good instead of having it so attenuated.

Today we have 232,903 officers and we hope to have under this plan 55,000. We plan to make a heavy cut. As to enlisted men, we have 187,000 and we hope to have 83,000—a heavy cut. Actually, however, those figures are misleading in that we haven't the equipment even to handle that number of reduced people. Today in the Reserves we have 20,806 officers, and 19,415 enlisted men actively participating in training.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Gavin.

Mr. GAVIN. Assuming, Mr. Secretary, the 6½ billion dollars were at present available for you, how long a time would it take to build up the 70-air set-up?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, the program as outlined before, sir, involves the completion of the 70-group program in the year 1952.

The CHAIRMAN. Even if the money were available now.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes.

Mr. GAVIN. All right.

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. This would be the second increment of that particular program.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Secretary, with reference to the drastic cut of your Reserve program that you spoke of, is that purely because of a lack of equipment or the result of planning or desire?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We have today, Mr. Hébert, 232,000 officers enrolled and we are going to train only 55,000. That is because we would rather have a tighter Reserve. But even if we had 55,000 today we are only training 20,806 officers.

I would like to have General Quesada comment.

General QUESADA. Future plans provide for more concentrated training as applied to the wise and economical expenditure of the funds that are being made available.

In the past we feel that we have made a tactical error in distributing our money and training on a wider field, and now we hope to combine it to a more narrow field, as was suggested. It would mean that 55,000 officers will get concentrated training, of which 25,000 will be in a pilot's pool.

Mr. HÉBERT. I am thinking of the desirability of maintaining your present Reserve officer strength among those who still desire to continue in the Reserve.

General QUESADA. There will be no attack on that whatever. The number, of 55,000, refers to those who will participate actively in the program. The number between 25,000 and 232,000 are those who will not be able to participate but will retain their commission if they see fit to do so and participate in correspondence courses, and things like that.

Mr. HÉBERT. In other words, it is a matter of planning and not a matter of lack of equipment or budgetary limitation?

General QUESADA. It is a matter of planning and it is fixed by budgetary limitations.

Mr. HÉBERT. What is the primary reason: Budgetary or planning?

General QUESADA. Budgetary.

Mr. HÉBERT. That is what I wanted to find out. In other words, if you had more equipment or higher budget, you would expand. It is more desirable, then, to expand than to cut back.

General QUESADA. That, I believe, is correct; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Secretary, do you consider it essential that this Nation have a 70-group air program in order to attain superiority in the air over all nations of the world?

Secretary SYMINGTON. From the military standpoint we have felt and feel that the 70-group program is advisable, Mr. Elston, but at this time the administration says that the money is not available. The administration has come out with a program. They know of the other commitments, which we do not know of, and we support the program.

Mr. ELSTON. The chairman mentioned UMT, and of course I have heard of a number of other things, like the St. Lawrence Seaway and socialized medicine and a few other things, which of course wouldn't mean very much if we were invaded from the air, and some other nation of the world had superiority over us.

So, under the circumstances, I take it your position is still what it was a year ago, that we need a 70-group program.

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. When we can afford it, I think it would be right to our security.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, do you think if any nation in the world contemplates invading this nation from the air they are going to wait until the Budget Bureau makes up its mind that the money is available?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would rather not answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Winstead.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Secretary, would you mind giving us the difference, or could you give us the difference in the actual plane strength or the striking power between the 48- and 70-group Air Force?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I have that right here, Mr. Winstead, but it is classified and I would prefer to give it to you in closed session, or off the record.

Mr. WINSTEAD. In other words, you either cut your striking force down or you cut down the assistance you can give the National Guard or Reserve group, or both, by cutting down to 48.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Blackney?

Mr. BLACKNEY. No question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson of California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Secretary, I notice in the bill you provide for the procurement of 5,200 planes a year. Now will that amount of business be a large enough amount so that you will have a production line, the nucleus of a production line, so in the event of a crisis we can expand that rapidly?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; it would.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is one of the big problems, isn't it, to have a production line that can be rapidly expanded?

Secretary SYMINGTON. It is important to have an industry capable of expansion; yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, I suppose you carry on a scientific research and development program right alongside of that.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. So that for every plane that comes off there is another one back further in the factory that is being worked on and is going to take the place of the one that is coming off the line in a few years.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.

For example, as Mr. Kilday mentioned, with respect to the B–36, the first time I saw the B–36 was in wood in January 1942. It is over 7 years ago.

When you have a plane you also constantly try to improve its performance, the same plane, instead of shifting to an entirely new model. That, of course, increases the time involved in building it but saves a good many hundred million dollars to the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, is there in the budget a provision to make Muroc Lake the expanded unit that is provided for in your plans that you approved?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would have to have General Rawlings answer that question—you mean the land or the housing?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am interested in the land.

General RAWLINGS. Mr. Johnson, in the actual budget we do not have construction money because the authorization bill has not gone through. But in the authorization bill we will have provision for Muroc Lake.

Digitized by Google

Mr. JOHNSON. That is in the public works bill for the Air Force.

General RAWLINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will include all that extra land that is in the last plan?

General RAWLINGS. Yes, sir. That is what we are proposing in our authorization bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions from any other members of the committee?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Secretary, did you make a comparison between the number of personnel under the so-called 59-group force and the 48 that you will have under the provisions of the budget that we now have before us?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, Mr. Bates, at 59-group we are not in any sense full. We were building the program as we expanded.

If you remember, last year you allowed us 66.

Mr. BATES. Yes, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. At this time we have 53,550 officers and 357,450 men. Even in the reduced program—full—we would have 57,000 officers, or around 3,500 more, and 355,000 men.

The authorization bill we are asking for, however, gives us a strength of 75,300 officers and 426,700 men, a total of 502,000.

Mr. BATES. So there would be a natural increase in personnel, notwithstanding the fact that the money available—in other words, you would have relatively the same number of personnel?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.

Mr. BATES. In the Air Force under the so-called 48 budget that you now have under the so-called 59 budget.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, I wish you would advise the committee, if you can, if there is $800,000,000 added to your budget what that would hatch out?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, that would have to be studied, sir. I don't know that figure.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, how close would it be to obtaining your objective, or how much would it would be under what was laid down for your objective last year?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, if you assume that of that $800,000,000—this is just assuming—we got a third, which would be around $275——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us assume you are going to get $800,000,000.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Beg pardon?

The CHAIRMAN. Let us not assume any thirds now. If you get $800,000,000, which is in the over-all budget—it is transferred from one item to another item, but still within the $42,000,000,000 budget—I would like to know what you accomplish by it? What could be accomplished by it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We would be about $2,000,000,000 short.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean two million?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Two billion.

The CHAIRMAN. Two billion?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much would that purchase, and what would it create, plus whatever you have?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would really like to study that out.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like for you to study that out and give us that information Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait 1 minute.

Secretary SYMINGTON (confers). Yes, sir; we can give it Monday morning.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you have it now?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Last year when we increased the budget it did not affect personnel at all; I mean, when we increased the appropriation by $822,000,000. That was entirely procurement.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. And everything else, for pay, subsistence, and housing remained the same as reported by the committee.

Secretary SYMINGTON. There was a compromise.

Mr. KILDAY. In these figures that we get Monday, I think we ought to be able to know to what extent we could consistently carry on the procurement program which we embarked upon last year by the addition of that money.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

If I follow your thought correctly—to be sure we get it—would you like to have any additional money that would be considered to apply exclusively to procurement? Is that correct?

Mr. KILDAY. So in '52 we would have 70 groups in the meantime absolute minimum of personnel that would have to be trained and developed for that 70 groups.

Secretary SYMINGTON. General Smith would like to make a comment on that.

General SMITH. In that connection, sir, the appropriation last year for procurement did start us on the way toward modernization and toward an eventual force of 70 groups in its first phase, if it kept up. If we applied the bulk of any moneys which might become available to aircraft procurement we would be further stretching a structure that is not properly supported now, and we must build a structure which is consistent with the aircraft.

Mr. KILDAY. In other words, your machines and your men have to come out even.

General SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BATES. One other question.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bates.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We didn't originally present it to the Bureau of the Budget, did you contemplate 59 groups, or more?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We didn't originally present it to the Bureau of the Budget, but originally presented it to the Secretary of Defense, and our presentation was made on the ceiling figure that we could support, which figure was, as given to the Military Establishment around $15,000,000,000, counting stock piling, sir.

Mr. BATES. Well, let me put it another way: In speaking of the air groups, did you consider 59 air groups in that request, or a lesser number, or more?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. Our presentation to the Office of the Secretary of Defense was based on various amounts of money that the over-all Military Establishment might get.

When the decision was made as to the over-all picture, we presented our group picture on the basis of that decision, and therefore we presented 48 groups, which was the figure approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Am I correct on that? I am out of my field here. It is a military question.

Mr. BATES. Well, do you subscribe to that, General?

General VANDENBERG. Would you repeat it?

The CHAIRMAN. What was the question, Mr. Bates? I lost track of it myself.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, the question was whether or not he submitted to the Bureau of the Budget originally funds in support of a 59-group force, or more. or less. That is the question.

General VANDENBERG. As I recall it, sir, we submitted to the Secretary of Defense budget figures in support of a 70-group force, a 59-group force, and a 48-group force.

Mr. BATES. Fine. All right. We have the answer.

What was the amount, Mr. Chairman, that you estimated the 70-group force would cost, 59, and so on?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We are already on the record on that, sir, that the 70-group force would be around 6½ billion.

Mr. BATES. Go ahead. Sixty-six?

Secretary SYMINGTON. The figures for 66 groups were submitted.

Mr. BATES. Well, can the general remember it? Somebody here must have the figures.

The CHAIRMAN. If not, put it in the record.

Mr. BATES. Wait a while. I think it is very important. You asked the same question yourself. I am trying to find out how much that $800,000,000 will take up.

The CHAIRMAN. He will bring that up Monday.

Mr. BATES. Very well.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We would rather get those figures for you. We know what the 70-group program was, and that was testified to. We know what the 48-group figure is, and we presented that this morning. The figures between we are not sure of, have forgotten, and would like to go back and restudy it and give you the facts.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Secretary, to go back to the statement you made some time ago about the hatchet act, do you have reference to the commentator who is on some time between 5 and 6 o'clock each evening, who is belittling the defenses of the country, and especially the Air Force?

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest, Mr. Van Zandt, let us not ask those kind of questions. We don't want to embarrass the Secretary now. He will tell us all that in executive session.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I think the statement should be repudiated.

The CHAIRMAN. We will go in executive session and take that up later.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, as long as Mr. Van Zandt has brought it up, I was not talking about any particular commentator.

Digitized by Google

I was talking about long and consistent commentation, writings, letters, all of which to the best of our knowledge in the Air Force are false with respect to the operating performance of this airplane.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, just general cussing about this airplane just going on?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Beg pardon, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Just general cussing about this particular airplane?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, we will go into that in executive session later.

Members of the committee, let us take a recess. But before we do so, I want to compliment the Secretary on the splendid statement. I think the country is indeed fortunate to have such an outstanding head of our armed service. The issue is clear-cut. His statement is explicit as to the requirements and the constitutional responsibility is upon the Congress.

I thank you, Mr. Secretary, and will see you Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Thank you, sir.

(Whereupon, at 12:08 p. m., the committee adjourned until Monday, January 31, 1949, at 10 a. m.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Monday, January 31, 1949.

The committee met at 10 o'clock, Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order. I regret to say that due to a death in his family, our able colleague from Louisiana, Mr. Brooks, will not be present for several days.

Mr. Secretary Symington, will you please take the witness chair?

Now, Mr. Secretary, the newspapers want to take a picture of you, so pose for them down there before we go to work.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, when the committee recessed Friday while we were considering H. R. 1437, you stated that it would require an additional $2,000,000,000 to provide for a 70 air group over and above the $800,000,000 that was being discussed at that time.

Have you any comments you want to make on that statement?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes; I have, Mr. Chairman. I have used the leveling-off figure in the 70-group figure, sir, and not the figure for the fiscal year 1950.

I should have used the figure 6½ billion, instead of 7½ billion.

Now I have a very short statement here I would like to read for the record clearing up several points, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, read it carefully so all the members can get it and so the country can understand what we are talking about and the reporters can carry it in such manner that they themselves will know what it is about.

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, in verbal testimony last Friday I inadvertently left out the following:

Authorizations provided in this bill, including authorizations for 24,000 aircraft, plus annual procurement authorization of 5,200 aircraft for replacement of unserviceable and obsolete types and for the creation and maintenance of a serviceable war reserve, round out the provisions for personnel and aircraft.

In addition, Congressman Kilday pointed out that we had given up the air-frame-weight approach for the number of planes approach, and after discussion over the week end, we believe it would be advisable to have section 203 of the bill not only include allowance as to the number of planes, but also allowance of total air-frame weight of 225,000 tons, which is the estimate of the weight of the 24,000 planes in question.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would want both in there?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; if we could.

In answer to one of your questions last Friday, Mr. Chairman, I indicated that assuming we receive the $800,000,000 additional of which you spoke, we would still be $2,000,000,000 short of the second-year planning for the 70-group program.

This was not correct because I used the leveled-off figure of 7½ billion dollars instead of the planned figure for 1950 of 6½ billion dollars. Guessing at the amount of money that would be allocated to the Air Force of the $430,000,000 placed in bulk in the Office of the Secretary of Defense results in our belief that with the addition of this $800,000,000, we would be about $1,000,000,000 short of the planned program, this instead of $2,000,000,000 and we are correcting our testimony accordingly.

You asked a question—

If you get $800,000,000, which is in the over-all budget—it is transferred from one item to another item, but still within the $42,000,000,000 budget—I would like to know what you accomplish by it? What could be accomplished by it?

The answer is that if the Air Force was given an additional $800,000,000—this was the figure I could not give you Friday and we worked on in the week end—in fiscal year 1950 over the allowances presently recommended in the budget, it would be able to establish in fiscal year 1950 a program of 57 effective groups instead of 48.

Since the original objective in fiscal year 1949 was to a 66-group phase of a 70-group program and activations took place accordingly, there would, of necessity, have to be some readjustments within the present composition of the force.

The military personnel requirements under this 57-group program would be a man-year figure of 440,000 and an end-of-year strength of approximately 450,000 instead of 412,000 under the 48-group program.

Four hundred and thirty-five million dollars of this $800,000,000 would be used for the procurement of aircraft.

This additional sum for aircraft procurement would make a total of 1.915 billion dollars available in fiscal year 1950 as against 1.545 in fiscal year 1949. This would permit an increase in aircraft procurement from 1,668 to 2,370, or an increase of 702 aircraft.

The remainder of the $800,000,000, or $365,000,000, would be used to secure the proper balance among the other areas of the 57-group force, such as men, materials, and equipment.

Digitized by Google

In reply to Mr. Kilday's question which we are taking the liberty of including as part of the answer to this question, the procurement of $1,915,000,000 that would increase the total number of aircraft procured from 1,668 to 2,370 compares to a figure of last year for $1,545,000,000 and a purchase of 2,437 aircraft.

In that connection, sir, we would like to point out that the airplanes we are buying this year in developing the programs are larger airplanes and that accounts for the apparent difference. And also the point that you brought up, that we had actually had $1,937,000,000 last year, but $392,000,000 of that was for plant improvement, subcontracting cost incident to the specification of the Congress to spread the work around, and production changes after we had gotten into production.

In summary, the money to be divided as follows, if we obtain the $800,000,000, would read:

Aircraft procurement	$435,000,000
Military personnel	94,000,000
Maintenance and operations	235,000,000

And then a relatively small item for some additional research and development, some additional salaries and administrative expense, and additional nonaircraft procurement, such as electronics and ground-handling equipment, totaling $36,000,000, or a total of $800,000,000.

This in summary, then, would provide 57 groups, with 450,000 military personnel end of year strength and 2,370 aircraft procurement.

In answer to a question from Mr. Bates, the final figures presented were for 59 groups and 48 groups. Those were the only two-group figures that were presented finally to the Bureau of the Budget and they are respectively $5,850,000,000 for the 59 groups and $5,025,000,000 for the 48 groups.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

Now, Mr. Secretary, have you an extra copy there that you can hand over to the press table? If not, we have one up here.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Jimmy, give this to the press table.

Now, Mr. Secretary, so we can all get right down to it, in the 1949 budget there was $1,915,000,000 made available?

Secretary SYMINGTON. For procurement, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. $1,937,000,000, I think the figure was.

The CHAIRMAN. $1,937,000,000?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you used a portion of that for retooling?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We used it this way: A certain amount for retooling and a certain amount for subcontracting and a certain amount for fixing plants and a certain amount for contract change orders.

Specifically, for the retooling and the changes of plants we had $150,000,000, for the estimated additional cost for change orders we had $150,000,000, and for subcontracting additional expenses incident to getting in small business we had $74,000,000, or a total of $375,000,000, and the remaining $18,000,000 we had for making particular changes on airplanes which we knew we wanted to make and specified at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Digitized by Google

After these diversions of your $1,937,000,000 that you just have spoken about, how much did you have left for purchasing airplanes?

Secretary SYMINGTON. $1,545,000,000, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that authorized you to procure how many airplanes?

Secretary SYMINGTON. 2,437.

The CHAIRMAN. They are under contract now?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When will they be delivered?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, some of them will be delivered this year and some of them next year and some of them the year after.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of them will be delivered in the calendar year 1949 and some in the calendar year 1950; is that correct?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So that you consider your first step in an orderly building program?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. DURHAM. Have you a break-down on the type, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes; I think we would rather classify that, but we will get that for you, Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in this budget for the fiscal year 1950 there was set up $1,480,000,000.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the $1,480,000,000 will procure how many planes?

Secretary SYMINGTON. 1,668, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So the budget now sets up $1,480,000,000, which will buy 1,667 planes?

Secretary SYMINGTON. 68; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. 1,668?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say if Congress augments that sum by an additional $800,000,000 you will then have for procurement a total of $2,280,000,000; would you not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. A total—would you say that again, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you just want to add $800,000,000 to your $1,480,000,000 and that would give you 2 billion——

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That would give you a total of about $2,280,000,000?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That would be if you put all of it in procurement.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But you say you can't use all of that for procurement because you have to use it for various other items?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; we would have to build it up in balanced fashion. In addition to the additional airplanes incident to the 57 groups, we would have to have the additional personnel and the additional maintenance and operation and the relatively slight——

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You have to take $94,000,000 of that for military personnel, you say?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. You would have to take $235,000,000 for maintenance and operation?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You would have to take $36,000,000 of that for other things?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what is the total of those three sums?

Secretary SYMINGTON. The total of those three sums is $365,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you would take $365,000,000 from your total of $2,280,000,000?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would give you a net balance of how much for procurement?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think it is $1,915,000,000.

General RAWLINGS. Right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you would have $1,915,000,000 for procurement?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would turn out how many planes?

Secretary SYMINGTON. And that would turn out 2,370 planes.

The CHAIRMAN. 2,370 planes?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be your second-year program?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With the ultimate objective over a period of 5 to 7 years of reaching a 70-group program?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That would mean you would be in your second year, having a completed program on paper of 57 groups?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty-seven groups.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, could I add a point to that, which might be pertinent?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Secretary SYMINGTON. It is true that the $1,937,000,000 we got last year, but of that the $392,000,000 was for charges which made it possible for us to do a more efficient job and would be spread, in effect, over the 5-year period and, therefore, on any basis it is fair to say that even if we only took $435,000,000 of the $800,000,000 for aircraft procurement, we would be getting $370,000,000 more for aircraft procurement in 1950 than we had in 1949.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. In other words, the net figure for aircraft procurement in 1949, sir, was $545,000,000 and on the basis of the question that you asked on the $800,000,000, it would be $1,915,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. You said you used three-hundred-some-odd-million dollars for tooling up. Does the committee understand that you advanced that sum of money to the aviation industry for equipment of plants?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would like to run over that again. It wasn't all for retooling. If we went into an aviation program, we had to put some plants in condition that were idle and that took quite a little money. We also had to tool.

85266—49—No. 12——6

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. All right. To what plants did you have to advance Government money to get them in financial condition to take Government contracts?

Secretary SYMINGTON. To the best of my knowledge, we did not do that with any company, sir, but where we had closed plants and did not have room—take one particular illustration. We wanted to make this very fast new jet bomber, the B-47, at Wichita, and nothing was being built at Wichita. So we opened up the Wichita plant and that cost money to open it up.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a Government plant, then?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you used that money for establishing a Government plant?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; for reopening it and getting it ready for production.

The CHAIRMAN. But you did not use any of that money that you spoke about in connection with retooling up for advancement to private-industry plants to enable them to accept Government contracts?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, we did not use it from the standpoint of giving them enough working capital to do business, but we might well have given them money for tools to build planes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point I am driving at is this: Are you getting credit in your price or are you getting paid back or anything for the money that you are advancing?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Oh, yes; very definitely so.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is reflected in the price?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. Chairman, can I make a point there also, sir. When we knew that we had the program—this point came up in the testimony Friday by Mr. Kilday asking a question about the programing—we were anxious to get that money so we could start tooling now in order to take advantage of a long-term tooling set-up where we would get net a much better ultimate cost.

Now, could I go ahead just a minute, sir?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Secretary SYMINGTON. The figure for those two—the question of opening the plants and the question of the tools—was $150,000,000, of that $392,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Now this is a Government plant?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That would be Government plant or tools in any plant, whether it was Government or private.

Mr. DURHAM. It is operating on contract, though?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right. The tools, of course, belong to the Air Force and we get credit for that, in that they cannot take a tool charge and add it as an item of cost.

Now in addition to that, we had $150,000,000 in it for contract changes. As you know, in airplanes we do not have standardization. What we do essentially is purchase, you might say, performance at a weight and instead of coming in and asking for more money to take care of major contract changes, as for example putting in the B-36 the 4360 engine instead of the 3350, which it originally started with, we asked for a block sum of money that could be allocated out as these changes came up, and that added another $150,000,000 of the $392,000,000—totaling $300,000,000.

Then we had pretty much of a directive for our contractual relationship, from the Congress, to include small business wherever possible; and, therefore, we instructed the manufacturers of airplanes to subcontract as much work as possible.

It is also fair to say that we tried to give to airplane companies who were not successful in finished-design contracts subcontracting work so they could keep their personnel together and maybe get an airplane contract later. That was another $74,000,000, sir, of that $392,000,000.

And the remaining amount was for specific changes on specific airplanes that we knew we wanted to make and, therefore, we did not include in the $150,000,000 as part of general contract changes that would come up in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now I want to digress for just a little bit. In view of this enormous procurement program, do you not think that the same provisions of renegotiation that were set up during the wartime should be applicable to all these contracts?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the Air Force led last year in the effort to get renegotiation clauses in all its contracts and everything that we are purchasing today, sir, has a renegotiation clause in it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is written in the appropriation bill?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. So you have no objection to having that principle applied in all contracts with reference to procurement of aviation—renegotiation?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir. Not only have we no objections, but we would very strongly advocate that renegotiation clause should be in these contracts. I would like to respectfully add to that that I think a renegotiation clause, if in our contract, should be in the contracts of all comparable procurement of the National Defense Establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Else the fellow who can get our business or another service's business naturally wants the other service's business because he knows he is not going to be renegotiated.

The CHAIRMAN. I thoroughly agree with you. There should be a provision with reference to renegotiation for all procurement of armed service.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Secretary, can you give us the differential in the cost in airplane-frame weight, say, in 1945 when we were in full production and at the present time in your procurement program?

Secretary SYMINGTON. The average cost per airframe pound for aircraft procurement during World War II was $19 as compared to $41.89 for the fiscal year procurement program of 2,437 aircraft. The difference in cost per pound can be partially attributed to more complex aircraft, higher material costs, and higher wage costs. However, the primary reason is the lower unit costs which resulted from procurement of about 300,000 aircraft during World War II as compared to the 2,437 aircraft in the fiscal year 1949 program.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it embarrass you to put in the record, to acquaint the committee and the country, just exactly what is meant when you read and talk about a 70-group program? Is it so confidential you cannot tell the committee in public how many bomber groups and how many other kinds of groups you have when you use the words "70-group"?

Secretary SYMINGTON. In answer to a good many questions on the bill, we have already submitted the answers to this and a good many other questions from you.

The CHAIRMAN. All I want to know: Is it so confidential you cannot tell the committee in public, when you use the 70-group as a definition of the strength of the Air Force, what a 70-group means? How many bombing groups do you have, and how many medium bomber groups do you have? Is it so confidential you cannot tell the country about that?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We did classify it, but if you think it would be a good idea——

The CHAIRMAN. What harm is it going to do? We are not going into the mechanism; we are not going into the characteristics of the planes. What harm does it do to acquaint the country with what a 70-group means?

Secretary SYMINGTON. If you——

The CHAIRMAN. You are the one to reach that decision, and not me. For instance, we know how many ships we have. We know what the character of the ships are. We know we have airplane carriers, we have battleships, we have submarines and destroyers. Now, why could not the country know that a 70-group means so many squadrons of this type, that type, and that type? Now, is there anything confidential about that?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I do not think there should be, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Wait 1 minute. Could you give it in major types, as has been suggested?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We can give that, sir, if you would like it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, do you consider and your staff consider that so restricted it cannot be published?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think some of our staff felt that way about it, but General Vandenberg and I do not feel that way about it.

The CHAIRMAN. General, what have you to say?

General VANDENBERG. Some of it was published last year, sir, in the record, and I can see no reason why the public should not know what the composition is in general.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you and the Secretary decide what you want to tell us about what constitutes the 70 groups, because we are going to be asked on the floor of the House.

Mr. SYMINGTON. We will give it to you now.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Give us what you think ought to be known to the public.

Secretary SYMINGTON. In the 70-group Air Force, heavy bombardment groups—that is, the B–36——

The CHAIRMAN. You don't even have to describe that. You do not have to tell what type of plane.

Secretary SYMINGTON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Leave that out.

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. That would be four.

In the medium bombardment group, that would be 16.

In strategic reconnaissance——

The CHAIRMAN. Leave out reconnaissance.

Mr. ANDERSON. We will not get the information if he leaves that out, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

Secretary SYMINGTON. There would be a total of 6. I will not break them down, in accordance with your thought, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Six?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. Pardon me, Mr. Secretary, are you speaking of squadrons or——

Secretary SYMINGTON. Groups.

Mr. ANDERSON. Groups?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Groups.

Secretary SYMINGTON. In light bombardment, there would be a total of five. Of fighters, there would be a total of 25.

Tactical reconnaissance, there would be four.

Heavy troop carriers, four.

And medium troop carriers, six.

In addition to that, there would be 22 separate squadrons for air-sea rescues, MATS, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That is what constitutes the 70 air group?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday, any questions?

Mr. KILDAY. I was just wondering how the figure that we have here of what you could procure, should $800,000,000 additional be added, compares with the figure that we hoped to reach last year. We had that itemized in the record. It was on the floor.

Can you recall what that was?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir; I cannot. That would be changed somewhat because since we got the final budget figures we have immediately gone ahead to reprogram. I would like to get that figure for you and present it to you.

Mr. KILDAY. My recollection is that it was somewhere around 2,500.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, as you know, we are using more of our money to improve some of our planes than we thought we would—as, for example, the change in the engine picture as I mentioned—and we are also buying some more bigger planes as against smaller planes than we thought we would.

Mr. KILDAY. It is my recollection that when the President signed the appropriation bill last year he instructed the Secretary of Defense to approve the money that you wanted to commit.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. To what extent was it committed last year?

Secretary SYMINGTON. All of it.

Mr. KILDAY. It was all approved?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. I take it the position taken by those of us in Congress who have insisted on the 70 groups has been justified by the executive department.

You do not have to comment if you do not want to.

Secretary SYMINGTON. May I make this point. When the final budget came out, we have to reprogram, and that money has been approved informally by both the Bureau of the Budget and by the Secretary of Defense, but the papers have not been sent; so there is no final approval of the final reprogramming incident to going to the 48 groups.

But it has been approved in principle, and the rest has been formally approved.

Mr. KILDAY. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. You mentioned one point there that I wish you could explain a little. I know you cannot do it in detail, but you mentioned in response to Mr. Kilday's question that you were not able to procure as many airplanes with the money you got as you testified you could.

Now, is that a pattern that has been going on ever since the end of the war, that they are getting larger and larger, or more costly and still more costly, say?

Secretary SYMINGTON. As a matter of fact, if the premise figure of 2,500 is correct, Mr. Johnson, we are pretty close. We are 2,370.

Of course, often it is better if you see where you can make major changes in an airplane to make those changes and get less airplanes, but a much better airplane. Then we come in and try to make that up in our next appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that not the invariable experience you have had in developing every airplane?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Sure.

Mr. JOHNSON. As you go along, you see where you can better it, and also the cost usually jumps up some?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, prices have been rising steadily.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, is that rule not also true in the relationship to the number of personnel you have to have?

In other words, in the bill you want so many people in your organization, or you have a top figure.

Secretary SYMINGTON. The personnel figure, has stayed much more stable. We have not changed the personnel figure, the top personnel figure for a year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not true, as a general principle, that the number of men (both civilian and military) that have to take care of a squadron or a plane is increasing all the time?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would say, if you have a bigger airplane, that you have more people, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Secretary SYMINGTON. But, if you have a bigger airplane, you buy less planes; and the net result is that you would probably have the same or a less number of people.

Mr. JOHNSON. So one offsets the other?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir, so far as personnel are concerned.

Digitized by Google

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that true in the new types of fighters. that you have to have more people for them?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is an operating question. I would have to pass that to General Vandenberg.

General VANDENBERG. In general, I think, Mr. Johnson, they will remian approximately level. As the difficulty of maintaining them increases, we generally cut down. I am talking more about the big planes. In the smaller planes, although they are more difficult to maintain, we do not expect to have more people.

Mr. JOHNSON. What relationship does the civilian group that handles those planes—services them and does other types of work, including administrative work—what relationship does that have to your regular military use and so forth?

How many are there in proportion, say?

General VANDENBERG. It is in direct proportion to the number of groups generally speaking, sir, and they are generally backing up the military in depots and in the matériel command.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We could get those percentages for you, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are they increasing? Is the ratio of civilian employees increasing to the military personnel?

General VANDENBERG. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it remaining about stationary?

General VANDENBERG. Approximately the same; yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

I think we ought to have somewhere—maybe it is in the record—this fact, that when you have ideas as to what you want to have turned out for a certain purpose, for a fighter plane or a reconnaissance plane, how much of a change is there from the time you start with it until it is produced on the production line and has been tested and ready for action?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, actually you never stop changing—the question sometimes is one of minor changes instead of major changes—but the difference between airplane production and other production I have been associated with previous to my coming in the Government is that you never standardize.

You are constantly trying to buy performance at a weight, and that gives your man in the air that much better chance of living in combat. Therefore, you constantly change them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is this a correct statement, that from the time you start on a new idea with a plane it is about 8 to 10 years until you finally get the finished product out to use?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well. you take the B-36. The B-36 I first saw in January 1942, in wood. The B-36 this year is much better than last year. Next year it will be much better than this year. There is 8 years right there.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, the B-29 was 9 years in the making; was it not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I do not know the history on that, sir. I know the B-17 better. That was about 8 to 9 years.

Mr. JOHNSON. But that would be a fair figure, would it not—about 8 years to get out the finished product?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think, Mr. Congressman, you would find it would be a little longer for the bombers than it would be for the fighters. I think before you went to many major modifications on fighters you would go to an entirely new airplane.

Mr. KILDAY. Is it not a little easier for a layman to understand when you say no plane, the design of which began after Pearl Harbor, participated in the last war?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But at the same time, Mr. Secretary, why can the industry not, and your researchers, try to reach some yardstick as to standardization and not constantly have changes on planes which are of a certain type occurring which increases the cost?

I know something about that as far as ship construction is concerned. There was never a ship laid down where they did not charge it everytime the moon changed. That increases the cost.

Now, for instance, take as an illustration the B–36. You know what it is now. You give a contract for it. Invention is going on—research is going on and development is going on. Why can you not standardize that procurement until some worth-while change is brought about, instead of trying to add to this plane and that plane.

And everything you add eats up your money. Now you have to bear in mind money is going to be a factor in the armed services. Every dollar has to be saved. You have to have equipment. So you should not spend all your money on constant changes because some inventor or someone says: "This will be a little bit better."

Now, one that is not right up to the last minute is better than none. So I am hoping the industry and you gentlemen will not have to think you are required to make changes every time the weather changes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not a fact that you have, parallel with your main construction, a modification program? You modify that very plane that the Chairman is talking about as you go along?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well of course, we do not make all the changes that are suggested. It is like when I first went into the radio business, around 1925 or 1926. We used to get a major change in tubes or circuits about every 6 months because the industry was so new.

I think what a lot of people do not realize yet is how new this airplane industry is. Take sights. Now certainly if you are going to build airplanes to bomb, and you get a new sight that cuts your mill error in half, it is well worth while to put it in.

Then, on one of these airplanes we have been discussing a lot, we have worked out a way to get a good many more thousand feet altitude.

That may be the difference in some cases between getting to the target and not getting to the target from the standpoint of flack. And also it is almost impossible for these fighter planes to operate at these high altitudes, to maneuver, because they have not much air and they fall away.

Then you have guns, armament defense. If you come up with a radically new improved defensive situation, you may, for a relatively little amount of money—the premise always being you only build warplanes on the basis there might be trouble—you might save your whole investment in that plane by putting on it the better armament.

So those things are very carefully analyzed, Mr. Johnson, in headquarters here, with operations people, and with the matériel people, and then a decision is made as to whether or not a particular suggested change is worth while to go into production.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Durham, any questions?
Mr. DURHAM. No questions.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole?
Mr. COLE. No questions
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Price?
Mr. PRICE. No questions.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Norblad?
Mr. NORBLAD. Yes. Could I ask what effect this new program of the Air Forces is going to have on the Reserve part of the program? Air reserve. Will it be increased or cut down?
Secretary SYMINGTON. I think we talked about that a little bit Friday, did we not? I tried to answer your question on that.
Mr. NORBLAD. Not as far as I was concerned, no.
Secretary SYMINGTON. You mean——
Mr. NORBLAD. In the future, as to your air reserve program.
Secretary SYMINGTON. We went into those figures I thought last Friday, but I would be very glad to have General Quesada give them to you again if you would like them.
Mr. NORBLAD. I was absent during a portion of the hearings. I may have missed them.
Those figures will show up in the hearings, I understand, from Mr. Van Zandt.
The CHAIRMAN. Any other questions?
Mr. NORBLAD. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. deGraffenried?
Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Gavin?
Mr. GAVIN. No questions.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt?
Mr. VAN ZANDT. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Doyle?
Mr. DOYLE. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston?
Mr. ELSTON. No.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Anderson?
Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. ANDERSON. If I may, I would like to ask one question which may be a little aside from the point under discussion this morning, but it is interesting to me and I think would be interesting to the committee.
On December 7 last, I was in Honolulu. There was a lot of talk among the people there about, I think, one of your B–36's arriving over Honolulu at extremely high altitude, dropping an assimilated load of bombs and returning to the mainland. Is it true that that flight was made and it was undetected?
Secretary SYMINGTON. I will let General Vandenberg answer that question.
General VANDENBERG. I believe it is.
Mr. ANDERSON. It was not detected?
General VANDENBERG. No, sir.
Mr. ANDERSON. It arrived at extremely high altitude from the mainland?
General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ANDERSON. Discharged an assimilated load of bombs and returned undetected?

General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right.

General VANDENBERG. The authorities, the proper authorities in Honolulu knew that the airplane was going to arrive, but because of the mission, we did not let it out.

Mr. ANDERSON. I mentioned that because——

General VANDENBERG. I presume you are talking about the aircraft-warning system there.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

General VANDENBERG. The aircraft-warning system that we have advocated will correct that situation, although probably not in Hawaii, again. The places that we have to defend with the money that we have available in order to get antiaircraft warning equipment and fighter defense have to be parceled out to those particular places where the Joint Chiefs feel is our first priority. It is expensive. It takes a lot of manpower.

Mr. ANDERSON. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, I would like for you to answer this question: Suppose Congress should adopt a program to level off at 57 instead of 70, what would be the annual maintenance cost of a 57 program?

Secretary SYMINGTON. A curbstone guess—I would rather check that, sir, and give you the facts—would be that it would be around 6½ billion dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. Six and a half billion dollars annually?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And with a 70-group program leveled off, it will be about $7,000,000,000?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Seven and a half, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Seven and a half?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Hébert, any questions?

Mr. HÉBERT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Winstead?

Mr. WINSTEAD. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Havenner?

Mr. HAVENNER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, something was said about whether or not you are increasing your employees on account of a building program or procurement program. Now, I submitted to you a series of questions and one of them was: Give the number of civilian employees in the Department of Air Force in Washington. You answered: As of October 31, 1948 you had 2,702 civilian employees at headquarters.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the civilian employees on duty in Washington Metropolitan District, as of October 31, 4,657.

Give the number of civilian employees of the Air Force in continental United States, and you answered: Air Force, civilian employees in continental United States, other than those on duty in headquarters, Washington, as of October 31, was 125,659. And the Air Force civilian employment in continental United States, other than those on duty in Washington, Metropolitan area, 123,704.

Give the number of civilian employees in the Air Force outside the United States, and you answered: Air Force civilian outside continental United States, 27,391.

Now, I would like to know if you are working under the Byrd Act with reference to employees, or is the Byrd Act not applicable to the employees in the Department?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir, the Byrd Act is applicable.

The CHAIRMAN. Is applicable.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you see no objection to putting it in this bill that the Byrd Act is still applicable to employees not only of the Air Force, but the Army and the other establishment, too?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, of course——

The CHAIRMAN. It does not embarrass you, does it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Except the less limitations we have on operation, why the better off we are.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt about it. That is the reason we want a little limitation because you might use all of your money for civilian employees when we want some airplanes.

Now we will read the bill section by section——

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, could I say one more thing about that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. You know, when the War Department and the Air Force separated, it was done under extraordinarily amicable conditions. Nevertheless, it did create a problem because constantly the things that came into the Air Force were in the War Department. I remember, for example, that there were 176,000 graded civilian employees allowed for the War Department, and of the 176,000, 126,000 stayed in the Army and 50,000 came to the Air Force.

Now, that is not in any sense a criticism of the Army because a great deal of the work that requires graded civilians they do for us and properly so, to save money, such as in the Quartermaster Corps and engineers. On the other hand, we believe that the Byrd law at these levels is pretty tough on us from the standpoint of what we need. We have not yet built up our own picture on the civilian employees and the Byrd law embraced the over-all picture. So long as you mentioned it, I would like to present that problem as far as we are concerned; and incidentally, and not in criticism but to present the problem, we have only increased our total number of graded employees from the Army to the Air Force about 1,700 since the original 50,000 split that was agreed to between the Army and the Air Force some 18 months ago. We are not in very good shape when it comes to civilian employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, with a limited amount of money your main objection should be equipment, first. You were divorced from the Department of the Army about a year and a half ago and in that length of time, from the figures I just read, it does not look to me that you were too much embarrassed by being able to put up a pretty good organization.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We have had some exemptions that have helped.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we want to begin to stop all these exemptions and have it dealt right across the table so we will know exactly what we are doing and where uor money is going.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, may I develop one point, if the Secretary and General Vandenberg are willing to discuss it.

What is the position of the Air Force as to the increase necessary in the Army if you go from 48 groups to 57 groups?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, General Ruffner gave me some testimony this morning. General Bradley plans to change his testimony somewhat and I would rather not comment on that until we have studied his testimony.

I would like to say, Mr. Kilday, that our relationship with the Army on those matters is a very good one. I would rather have them say, because they do the servicing as against us saying what it requires. Last year we got along with them very well and I am sure this year we will reach agreement.

Mr. KILDAY. We, of course, do not want to keep you from getting along, but we are fearful we may be asked as to that when get on the floor.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir. We have some new testimony from the Army on that, but I would rather have them give it than have us give it.

Mr. KILDAY. I think the two of you will get together on it.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And in that way certain provisions of the draft may have to be invoked. With the increase of authorization of $800,000,000, it might necessarily follow you have to increase the Ground Force.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Secretary, if you are compelled to cut your appropriations below the 70-group program down to a 48-group program, would it prevent you from acquiring some bases that you consider essential to the security of the Nation?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, we get back into the same discussion that we had Friday and that is what the military and the Air Force consider is essential to security, sir, is not paramount, as I see it. Anybody against us could win in two ways. The first would be in a battle, and the second would be by forcing us to spend more money than the country could afford, getting into deficit financing.

Although naturally we are going to have less bases if we have 48 groups instead of 70, with the premise that our part of the show is only a relatively small part, we are glad to support the 48-group program.

Mr. ELSON. I take it, then, you would have to do without some bases that you would like to acquire.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; we would.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, to sum it up, then if Congress stays within the over-all budget of $42,000,000,000 and gives us $800,000,000 more, that will be a continuation of the program that we laid down last year in a very satisfactory manner, would it, as far as bearing in mind the economic stability of the country?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, it would give us more groups.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Well, going on that basis, how long would it be before we would reach the 70 group? How many years?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That would be a little hard to figure, sir, but it would extend the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, how long?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, would it extend over a 5-year or 7-year period?

Secretary SYMINGTON. It would depend on what you gave us next year, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Let us assume that Congress levels off at $2,280,000,000 for procurement; how many years before you get your 70 group?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, we have had a little informal discussion here. General Rawlings, who probably knows more about it than anybody, thinks 1954.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us get that straight. If Congress adopts this policy now to make available $2,280,000,000 for procurement, by 1954 you will have reached your 70 air group, is that correct?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, at the end of the fiscal year 1954, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And at that time the annual budget to support it will be in the neighborhood of $7,500,000,000.

Secretary SYMINGTON. At present price and costs.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we all understand.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is a guesstimate, Mr. Chairman. We would like to check back on that.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is a guesstimate. We would like to check back on it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. I think you guessed pretty well.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Did I understand you to say we were going to start reading the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Would it not be well at this time if we listened to the representatives of the National Guard and the Reserve?

The CHAIRMAN. When we reach that point in the bill relating to them, we will give them an opportunity. We cannot do but one thing at a time. We have one witness. Let us exhaust him before we exhaust someone else.

Mr. GAVIN. May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Secretary, are all our military bases equipped with GCA?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir.

Mr. GAVIN. How many of them are?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I could not answer that question.

General VANDENBERG. I would guess, sir; that there are about seven in the continental United States and all of the fields in the Berlin airlift are equipped with it and one in Tokyo.

Mr. GAVIN. Would you think it is very important that all of our military fields be equipped with that kind of control approach?

Digitized by Google

General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir, I think all of the possible radar aids to navigation and to landing that save lives that we can get are essential.

Mr. GAVIN. It is important that that question be carefully studied.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General Vandenberg, before we start to read the bill, I would like for you to present your views, if you have any to present to the committee.

General VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I have a prepared statement that I could read if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Have all members copies of it? Let all members have a copy of the statement.

Before we start with General Vandenberg, any questions any members in a general way want to ask the Secretary?

All right, now. Go ahead and make a picture of the general now.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General, the committee will be pleased to have you make any comment that you desire in regard to H. R. 1437. Let there be order in the committee now.

General VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of title II of this legislative proposal is to establish in law the composition of the Air Force and certain other ancillary authority.

Legislation embodying the intent of the Congress with respect to composition of a military service is necessary as guidance for those who administer that service, and is a means of insuring continuity in the development of the service.

Such legislation also provides a broad long-term authorization upon which the service may base its periodic estimates of requirements. H. R. 1437 defines the Air Force as to size, components, and general activities.

The bill establishes, therefore, the basis upon which the Air Force could plan its development for the years to come. The Air Force, created as a separate military service by the National Security Act of 1947, does not now have adequate statutory basis for its nature, scope, and composition. This legislation would provide that basis.

It would further provide the necessary procurement authorization to carry out the purposes of the act and authority for the Air Force to conduct research and development programs pertaining to its own activities.

During the past year two independent civilian agencies, the President's Air Policy Commission and the Congressional Aviation Policy Board, made exhaustive studies of the requirements of the United States for a minimum Air Force capable of providing, in conjunction with the other services within the National Military Establishment, for the air power they considered necessary for the national security.

The Air Force believes that authorization should be enacted to provide the basis for such an Air Force. Only by enactment of legislation of this nature can an objective be established for that Air Force considered requisite to our national security.

In the light of world conditions, in case of aggression against the United States, the major tasks to be undertaken by the Air Force in the defense of our country are clear:

Digitized by Google

First. The delivery of an immediate and powerful strategic air offensive against the basic sources of our enemy's war-making capacity.

Second. The defense of the United States and our essential bases against attack by air.

Third. Tactical support of the Army and Navy in exploitation of the opportunity presented through successful prosecution of the first two tasks.

It is the strong conviction of the Air Force that these tasks are basic undertakings common to all of the various possible strategic situations that may exist now or in the foreseeable future in the event of war.

The success of these operations by the Air Force will gain for the Nation a situation in which the combined power of all arms could be employed most economically and with the most favorable opportunities for success and a period of time for the wartime mobilization of our resources. These three basic tasks may be considered therefore as the measures necessary to avoid losing the war.

The task of gaining and maintaining air superiority, the winning of the air battle, is a requisite to surface operations. No country can survive for long when the air above it is exploited freely by an enemy.

The attainment of this objective permits our surface forces to operate at places and times of their own choosing and under the most favorable conditions.

The basic requirements of the peacetime Air Force are twofold, and in considering one we must not lose sight of the other. We must have in our peacetime Air Force not only the capabilities of combat-ready forces necessary for defense, for the initial strategic offensive, and for tactical support, but we must also have the platform to permit us to expand to the forces which may be required to exploit the initial advantages gained by the air offensive.

The initial operations must have in being a back-up of trained and equipped forces. This back-up must be supported by an aircraft industry capable of rapid expansion.

Provision for meeting these requirements would be the strongest deterrent to those who might destroy the peace of the world through aggression and are the most certain safeguards of our security if war should occur.

As regards this bill: Section provides that the Air Force of the United States shall be authorized 70 Air Force groups and 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by 61 Reserve groups, together with necessary supporting elements.

This is the organization recommended by the Air Force as a basis for planning. This plan has my firm approval and my predecessor as Chief of Staff of the Air Force, Gen. Carl Spaatz, likewise approved the plan. I recommend, however, that the bill be amended by the addition of the word "Regular" in line 19, page 4, before the words "Air Force," so that the phrase will read "70 Regular Air Force groups."

The Air Force authorized by this bill is of the same general character as that recommended independently by both the President's Air Policy Commission and the Congressional Aviation Policy Board.

I would like to emphasize that the language of this section is broad enough to cover either the present type of organization of the civilian components or any organization which may be adopted by the Congress as a result of the Gray Board's recommendations. The organization of either the Air National Guard or the Reserve need not be affected by this legislation.

Section 202 defines the groupings of officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons which make up the 502,000 over-all military strength, which is the same strength figure set up for the Air Force in the Selective Service Act of 1948.

This total figure includes 75,300 officers, including warrant officers, of which 35,000 may be Regular Air Force officers and 4,800 Regular Air Force warrant officers, and 426,700 enlisted personnel of all grades.

The CHAIRMAN. General, one minute. If you are going to read and explain each section, I think it might be a good idea to read them and then comment on them as they are read.

General VANDENBERG. Very well, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, is there any questions of a general nature that anyone wants to address to the distinguished general? If not, then let the staff, Mr. Blandford, read section 201.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could I ask one question before you read that?

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. That ratio of 75,000 over-all, including 35,000 of the Regular force, is that about the ratio you are maintaining now in your office make-up? About half of them are non-Regulars?

General VANDENBERG. No, sir. 18,000 Regulars now.

Mr. JOHNSON. How many of the other kind?

General VANDENBERG. 34,000 Reserves, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Almost 2 to 1 in favor of temporary officers?

General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now read section 202, Mr. Blandford.

Mr. BLANDFORD. 201 or 202?

The CHAIRMAN. Section 201.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

SEC. 201. The United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 Air Force groups and 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by 61 Air Force Reserve groups, together with necessary supporting and auxiliary units. The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements, including tactical, administrative, logistic, air transport, and training, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, any amendments you propose to section 201?

General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir, the one I previously stated, on line 19, page 4, before words "Air Force" so it will read "70 Regular Air Force groups."

Mr. KILDAY. Did not the Secretary suggest an amendment this morning as to airframe pounds?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes. It goes in 203, Mr. Kilday.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

You have that, Mr. Blandford?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir, I have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Any objection of any member of the committee to inserting the amendment proposed by General Vandenberg?

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. I wish we would get rid of that word "Regular." We never used that word in the National Defense Act. We always referred to the United States Army and the Army of the United States or Reserve.

I wish we could come to some understanding, both as to the Army and the Air Force.

General VANDENBERG. Could I comment on that, Mr. Kilday. The reason for that is this: Every time we get into conversation about it either in Congress or otherwise about the 70-air-group program, there is some doubt about it.

The 70-air-group program consists of regular units and civilian components. We are trying to differentiate here for people who have that confusion what we are talking about in this particular phase, because the two are exactly the same.

We call it a 70-group program which includes all of the civilian components and the regular components here.

Mr. KILDAY. We never had any trouble before in distinguishing between the Regular Army of the United States and the Army of the United States.

General VANDENBERG. The purpose was for clarification, and if it does not succeed in doing that I would withdraw my recommendation.

Mr. KILDAY. I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under this proposal we will have a Regular Air Force of 22 separate groups, is that correct?

Mr. BLANDFORD. 70 groups, 22 seperate squadrons——

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, 70 Regular Air Force groups, 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by 61 Air Force Reserves.

Now that constitutes the Air Force, is that correct?

General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. General, down there you used the words "auxiliary units." In doing that do you refer to the Civil Air Patrol or is the Civil Air Patrol considered part of the Air Force? That is line 22.

General VANDENBERG. There are things such as base groups, sir, that are necessary. That includes such items as that.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, in the last Congress we authorized the Civil Air Patrol and I understand that the Regular Army officers are in charge of it.

General VANDENBERG. That is right, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that comprehended in that word "auxiliary" or is that group of men in the Regular Air Force?

General VANDENBERG. I would say, sir, that that would not come under that.

Mr. JOHNSON. How many of the Regulars are occupying their time with handling the Civil Air Patrol?

Mr. McCONNELL. Sixty-nine Regular officers.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all.

General McCONNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. And then some civilians, I suppose?

85266—49—No. 12——7

Digitized by Google

General McConnell. Sixty-nine Regular officers, 72 enlisted men, and 52 civilians.

The Chairman. Now, supplemented by 61 Air Force Reserve groups. That is made up by National Guard air groups; is that it?

General Vandenberg. Yes, sir, and Reserve.

The Chairman. All right.

Now give a little information to the committee as to how strong you are today in that category. How many National Guard air groups have you?

General Vandenberg. May I have General Quesada answer that. He is a specialist on that.

The Chairman. Come around here, General. Tell us something about your National Guard Air Force.

General Quesada. The program provides for 27 National Guard groups.

The Chairman. That is your program in existence today?

General Quesada. Yes, sir.

The Chairman. It provides for 27 National Guard groups?

General Quesada. And 31 groups of the Air Force Reserve.

The Chairman. Thirty-one Reserves?

General Quesada. Thirty-four in total.

The Chairman. Thiry-four?

General Quesade. Of the Reserve.

The Chairman. Now, of the 27, how many have been created?

General McConnell. Twenty-five.

General Quesade. Twenty-five.

The Chairman. Then, we have 25 National Guard air groups in existence today?

General Quesade. Yes, sir.

The Chairman. Now, where are they located? How do you determine where you put them?

General Quesade. Well, we are trying to put one squadron in each State. We could give you a more accurate break-down from records that we have here.

The Chairman. Well, read the record and let us see what you are doing about it.

Come up here, somebody, and read it into the record.

General McConnell. Mr. Chairman, those are dependent upon two things: The first is the security of the United States. We try to locate them strategically as far as security of the United States is concerned because most of them are fighter groups to be used for the defense of the United States in case of attack.

The Chairman. And you have located 25 of them?

General McConnell. They have actually located 26. One has just come in.

The Chairman. Twenty-six?

General McConnell. Yes, sir.

The Chairman. Now does that mean that there is more than one group in certain States?

General McConnell. That may be true. There may be one group headquarters in more than one State, although that is not at the present time so. We offer these to the States.

The Chairman. That is right.

Digitized by Google

General McCONNELL. Where we think they ought to be located. In the event the State is able to come up with the number of personnel and accept the burden of their portion of the expense involved in establishing the National Guard outfits, then we go ahead and approve them.

In the event the State that we offer it to from a strategic standpoint is not able to accept it because probably it has already another unit or two there, then we offer it to the next best from a strategic standpoint.

That is the way they are located.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, it is left entirely to the States as to whether or not they accept the group that you are referring them?

General McCONNELL. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Air Force here has no authority to require a State to accept them?

General McCONNELL. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the support of it is dependent upon a contribution from the State as well as a contribution from the Government?

General McCONNELL. Yes, sir. The State makes a very small support of it actually in appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, have you more applications for the establishment of the Air National Guard than you are actually putting in? Are you turning down any States or hesitating to put any in the States that are making application for it?

General McCONNELL. I think there are only two instances where States have applied for an additional squadron where we have not put additional squadrons.

But that is because the troop basis of the National Guard as presently set up only permits a total of 27 groups in the war plan required for the war plan.

Now, in the event that that number were to be augmented, I believe we could go to the States and ask them if they would accept an additional commitment.

And I believe we could get them to take an additional commitment for as many as 12 more squadrons.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, put in the record where those 25 are located.

General McCONNELL. Twenty-six, Mr. Chairman, located as follows: New York, N. Y.;[1] Philadelphia, Pa.;[1] Chicago, Ill.;[1] Augusta, Maine; Boston, Mass.; Hartford, Conn.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Newark, N. J.; Washington, D. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Nashville, Tenn.; Columbus, Ohio; Indianapolis, Ind.; Louisville, Ky.; Detroit, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; St. Louis, Mo.; Des Moines, Iowa; St. Paul, Minn.; Dallas, Tex.; Tulsa, Okla.; Denver, Colo.; Portland, Oreg.; San Francisco, Calif.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Birmingham, Ala.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you say your war plans only call for an Air National Guard of 27, is that correct?

General McCONNELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that correct?

General McCONNELL. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Then the balance of your reserve is strictly Reserve, is that it?

General McCONNELL. Yes, sir; that is correct.

[1] Light bomb groups—all other are fighter groups.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Now give the committee some information on how you establish a Reserve group. Who establishes it and what do you do with it? Do you put it on paper and forget it or do you put it in actual being?

General MCCONNELL. When the war plan is revised you determine how big the Regular Establishment will be as required to support the war plan and as limited by the appropriations for the Regular Establishment.

The National Guard having been placed in second priority as a portion of the defense force of the Air Force at 1946, we determined what we believed was the maximum the National Guard could accept and that came out to 27 groups.

The difference between what the Regular Air Force could furnish and what the National Guard could furnish was made a requirement upon the Air Force Reserve.

The requirement in consonance with that war plan was too high for the Air Force Reserve to meet considering two capabilities: First the capabilities of the Reserves themselves to participate in a program that is that broad, and second the capabilities of securing sufficient appropriations and equipment to implement a program that is that broad.

Then you actually have a gap between your war plan requirements and what you will actually have on M-day due to the fact that you cannot support the required number of Reserves.

Now we established the required number of Reserves as 148,000 in the Organized Reserves and they were to be divided into units. And we established the units as being a total of 34 groups, divided into different types of groups as to where they would be required for deployment from M-day until M plus a certain number of months, at which time the people could come in from civilian life and make up the other necessary groups and we would not have any requirement for training Reserves past a certain period of the war.

We were not able to put the equipment on those groups. So where we have them organized, they are organized only on paper and they do not have combat equipment on them at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as a matter of fact, you have not any in being; it is just on paper?

General MCCONNELL. They are on paper and will be on paper until about the 1st of July of this year, at which time we will have 27 of them who will be in being. They will be in being, though, and equipped with one-fourth of the equipment which they are supposed to have.

The rest will be equipped purely with training-type equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have sufficient money in the appropriation from last year and what is in this to put 27 in existence?

General MCCONNELL. With one-fourth of the equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. With one-fourth of the equipment.

General MCCONNELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that would be a considerable improvement over the situation today, will it not?

General MCCONNELL. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Because today it is all on paper.

General MCCONNELL. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions from any members of the committee in regard to the National Guard or the Reserve?

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course the present plan constitutes 61 groups in the Guard and Reserve combined?

General MCCONNELL. That is correct, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And this bill does not propose to augment that.

General MCCONNELL. That is right, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. But we have augmented the Reserve of the Army and the National Guard of the Ground Forces.

General MCCONNELL. That is correct, but in the Reserves you do not need in the National Guard and the Reserves any more groups than you have to have from the time the war starts up until the time you could organize the groups and get the equipment on them from production and get the people out of civilian life to man them and have the people trained. So you have a striking force which the Regular Air Force and a portion of the Reserve and the National Guard groups which we referred to altogether as Reserve groups——

Mr. KILDAY. Anyway, the Department does not recommend that there be a comparable increase such as they have done with the Army?

General MCCONNELL. No, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Now let me clear this one thing up. I have been reading something about a board down there known as the Gray Board. I have not seen any reports from them. Is there anything in the bill that changes the set-up from what it is now?

General MCCONNELL. No, sir; there is nothing in this bill which proposes any changes in the present set-up.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in this bill that carries any recommendations of the Gray Board in regard to federalization of the Reserve?

General MCCONNELL. There is not anything in this bill.

Mr. KILDAY. It is the opposite, as a matter of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. It gives it statutory existence.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as a matter of fact, we are establishing this under State jurisdiction, just like the Ground Forces, is that correct?

General MCCONNELL. In the terms of this bill the language says "61 Reserve groups."

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General MCCONNELL. That does not mean 61 groups of the United States Air Force Reserve. Neither does it mean 61 groups of the Air National Guard of the United States. It means a total of 61 groups between the two of them.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. So that question is not involved in this bill.

General MCCONNELL. Not involved; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Any questions of any other members?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. General, you indicated that by July 1 these organizations, Reserve and National Guard organizations, would have about one-fourth of their equipment. Is it planned that they have modern equipment such as jet-propelled planes and the latest types of planes, or are they going to be required to use obsolete equipment?

Digitized by Google

General McConnell. Sir, that depends entirely upon when the war plan calls for the unit to be committed to combat. In the event the unit is to be committed to combat at an early date, then it is equipped within the limits of the appropriations and the limits of the productive capacity.

It is then equipped with first-line aircraft. Under the present plans, under the 48-group program, we would have equipped 11 of the National Guard groups which were specifically designated for immediate combat with jet aircraft.

That would have been done in 1952. At present we have five of those National Guard groups being reequipped with jet aircraft. The groups which will come into combat later will get correspondingly a later type or more obsolete aircraft and the ones which will come in still later will have a still more obsolete aircraft until you get down to the last ones who come in who will have only sufficient aircraft and equipment to permit them to maintain their proficiency so that when the equipment becomes available in time of war they will be ready to pick it up and go off with it.

The Chairman. Any further questions?

Mr. Durham. Do you set these groups up on the existing fields of operation, wherever you have the Regular forces?

General McConnell. I did not understand that question.

Mr. Durham. Do you set these groups up on the existing fields where we have at the present the operations of the Regular Army?

General McConnell. In some instances they are and in some instances they are not, sir. It depends on the proximity of Reserve population. For example, we have a big establishment at Roswell, N. Mex., but there is no Reserve population in Roswell. Therefore we have to establish it——

Mr. Durham. Especially in these colleges in my section, you send them down there and then they have nothing to operate with.

Secretary Symington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one observation on this Reserve picture.

Each year, when the money is cut, it works out worse for the Reserve picture than for any part of the Air Force. I think our problem has been primarily a problem of money over a period of years in the Air Force Reserve.

The Chairman. Mr. Cole.

Mr. Cole. Mr. Chairman, if the Department will put in the record the location of the 27 or 25 Reserve units that it is expected to be activated—— Secretary Symington. Twenty-six.

Mr. Cole. Twenty-six, or whatever it is.

Mr. Van Zandt. Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. Van Zandt. I wonder if it would not help us to have possibly a comment from the representatives of the National Guard or Reserve officers. We have the Army side of it and the Air Force side of it. Now let us take the Reserve side of it.

The Chairman. We are going to give them a full hour or two of it. Let us not mix it up. Let us finish with the Department. Then we will hear from General Reckord.

We are not going to slight the general.

Mr. Johnson?

Digitized by Google

Mr. JOHNSON. I wonder if you could put in the record the number of nonpaid civilians working in the Civil Air Patrol. Or if you have it, you can give it to us now.

General MCCONNELL. I can give you that information.

Mr. JOHNSON. If you do not have it, you can put it in the record. That is all we want, the nonpaid.

General MCCONNELL. The members of the Civil Air Patrol themselves?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

General MCCONNELL. To be accurate, they are as follows:

	Actual	Planned fiscal year 1949	Ultimate
Senior	131,000	150,000	250,000
Cadet	28,000	70,000	160,000

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Norblad.

Mr. NORBLAD. General, is there any joint use of facilities between the Air Reserve and the Naval Reserve? Are you working absolutely independent one of the other?

General MCCONNELL. No, sir; we are not working independently of each other.

Mr. NORBLAD. Well, is there any joint facility you are using together?

General MCCONNELL. There are several cases where we are using joint facilities not only with the Air Force Reserve and the Naval Air Reserve, but also with the Air National Guard and the Naval Air Reserve. It depends, again, upon the adjacency to the facility of suitable reserve population.

Mr. NORBLAD. Well, would it be the same Reserve population for both?

General MCCONNELL. That is right.

Mr. NORBLAD. I mean there would be a city in both cases?

General MCCONNELL. We just finished with the negotiations with the Navy where we occupy Niagara Falls jointly. We occupy Birmingham jointly, and we have gone further than that, to the extent that we do not only occupy the facilities jointly, but we used each other's.

For example, at Birmingham we mess everybody and the Navy houses everybody. They use our operations set-up. We use their ammunition storage dump.

There are several instances of that not only between the Air Force Reserve at the Naval Air Reserve, but the Air Guard and the Navy Air Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions on section 201? If not, let Mr. Blandford read section 202.

Mr. Blandford:

Authorized personnel strength. Section 202. The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized an active-duty strength of 75,000 and 300 officers, including warrant officers (of which number 35,000 may be Regular Air Force officers and 4,800 may be Regular Air Force warrant officers), and 426,700 enlisted persons, which numbers shall be exclusive of such 1-year volunteers for training as authorized by the Congress, officer candidates, aviation cadets, and personnel of the reserve components on active duty for training purposes only.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, what is the present-day strength in personnel in the enlisted force of the Air Corps?

General VANDERBERG. 357,364, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. 357,000.

Now, if we grant this $800,000,000, how much will you have to increase your present 357,000 in the enlisted personnel?

General SMITH. The increase from 357,000 to 364,000——

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would increase it to——

General SMITH. No sir, from 357,000 to 365,000, the present strength, it would be increased to 426,700 under the 70-group program.

The CHAIRMAN. To 426,000. Now, how soon can you bring up your strength from 357,000 to 426,000? Can you do it in time to get the planes?

General SMITH. If I may be sure that I was correct, sir, we were talking about what we would need to go to under H. R. 1437, is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. No, I asked the general what his present strength was and he said it was 357,000.

General SMITH. Yes sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is what it is today.

General SMITH. Yes sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I asked if we add $800,000,000 to it, what would your strength be to take care of that additional $800,000,000 more?

General VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, they have not broken that down between officers and men. May we get that and put that in the record?

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You break it down and put it in the record and give us a memo on it.

	End, fiscal year 1950	Average, fiscal year 1950 (man-years)
Commissioned officers	60,798	58,120
Warrant officers	2,600	2,600
Airmen	386,602	379,280
Total [1]	450,000	440,000

[1] Excludes personnel for Operation Vittles.

Secretary SYMINGTON. It was 412,000 with 48 groups and 450,000 at the end of the year with 57 groups.

The CHAIRMAN. Your figure 357,000 includes officers, warrant officers, and everything else?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. That is 38,000 over all, is it not?

General RAWLINGS. No, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. The 357,00 is enlisted men only, Mr. Chairman. You understand that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. All right.

Mr. KILDAY. Did you say you would have to go from 412,000 officers and men to 450,000 officers and men?

Secretary SYMINGTON. End of year strength.

Mr. KILDAY. A total increase of 38,000 officers and men.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

Digitized by Google

General VANDENBERG. To answer your question, Mr. Chairman, as to how soon we could get that, we can immediately start opening recruiting and get to it very shortly.

The CHAIRMAN. Anyhow, you could build your force up as soon as you could get the equipment.

General VANDENBERG. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Or before?

General VANDENBERG. Sooner; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now let us see. Has anyone any question on section 202? Are there any amendments you are offering to section 202?

General VANDENBERG. No, sir.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to 202, to make it comply to the earlier section relating to the Army with respect to the 1-year enlistees, so that it will read: "One-year enlistees as are or may be authorized by law" instead of "one-year volunteers for training as authorized by the Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. Any comment on that, General?

General VANDENBERG. May General Edwards answer that, sir?

General EDWARDS. If I understand your question, Mr. Cole, it is why we exempt the 1-year enlistees from the total figures.

Mr. COLE. No; the words that you used to describe them, is all. You call them 1-year enlistees for training, when as a matter of fact they are not. They are 1-year enlistees for service. The only limitation is they cannot be sent out of the United States for service.

General EDWARDS. That is right.

Mr. COLE. So we should not in our law refer to them as enlistees for training, which they are not.

General EDWARDS. Of course, we have a very limited use from them for 1 year. By the time they finish their recruit training, they have already been in the service for perhaps 15 weeks and——

Mr. COLE. At any rate, as far as the law goes, we should call them what they are: 1-year enlistees for service.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; service instead of training.

Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. At the present time, what is your backlog on present applications from Reserve officers requesting active-duty assignments? Can anybody give that?

General EDWARDS. Would you mind repeating that, please, Mr. Durham?

Mr. DURHAM. Your applications at the present time from your Reserve officers for extended active duty?

General EDWARDS. On extended active duty?

Mr. DURHAM. That is right.

General EDWARDS. Approximately 40,000.

Mr. DURHAM. What is your backlog that you have not taken in?

General EDWARDS. Oh, that we have not taken in?

Mr. DURHAM. That is right.

General EDWARDS. We have applications pending from approximately eight to ten thousand Reserve officers to come on extended active duty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you guaranty them any particular length of service when they come on duty?

Digitized by Google

General EDWARDS. No, sir; we protect the interest of the Government primarily. We require them to sign a statement that they will remain on active duty for 3 years, but if for any reason we would have to cut down our force that agreement only protects the Government and does not protect the individual.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well——

General EDWARDS. He normally can expect——

Mr. JOHNSON. As much as 3 years, perhaps?

General EDWARDS. He normally can expect to be on for 3 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment suggested by Mr. Cole will be agreed to.

Now, the thought is running through my mind to write a new section in the bill right here, known as section 203, because this relates to personnel and it ought to relate to civilian personnel, and I think there ought to be a section there carrying out the Byrd Act just like we had it when we passed it through the House.

Mr. KILDAY. Did we not exempt them?

Mr. BLANDFORD. That was stricken on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is not going to hurt to put it in.

The CHAIRMAN. I put that in the bill when I introduced it separately. Then when the Department asked the bill be combined and I asked them to draft it, I see they left it out. Of course, I have no doubt in understanding why they left it out, because they did not want any restraint put in there by Congress with reference to the employees. But I think we ought to carry out what Congress already has sought to do and that is to limit the use of employment of civilian, civil-service employees. Let us not eat up all our money by giving jobs out.

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir. Mr. Chairman, General Rawlings would like to say a word on that, if he might.

General RAWLINGS. Mr. Chairman, you started developing the point about the relationship between civilian personnel strength and military strength. Actually, there is a close relationship. It was not brought out this morning very clearly that that relationship does exist. It would take approximately 225,000 civilian employees to go with the 502,000 military strength to give the full support for the full 70-group program that has been outlined.

The Byrd law ceiling as it now applies to the Air Force as a result of our separation from the Army is roughly 50,000. Actually, with transfer agreements and some exemptions, we have in the current appropriation act, I believe it is about 61,000 graded employees authorized under the Byrd law.

Therefore, if we had this full force the way the plan is laid out, since there is a relationship of about 1 to 1 graded to ungraded in our kind of activity, we should have an authorization of something like 100,000 graded positions.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it will be 1954 before you get up there. Now, what is the use of putting them to work now? You may have to have more. And, of course, the civilian personnel should go along with the military personnel. They have a relation. But what you will be doing is that you will be filling up in 1949 what you need in 1954. I know of the tendency to find jobs.

General RAWLINGS. Sir, that was not my proposal. I was approaching this purely on the basis of the authorization bill when it was finally reached. I would not propose that in 1950, sir. That was not the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if you have the authority to put them on, you will be the first Federal agency that does not exercise that authority.

General RAWLINGS. Sir, it was not in the bill. It was only when you raised the point of having that section that——

The CHAIRMAN. When it was redrafted you all left it out. Now I am suggesting to the committee for its consideration the advisability of putting it back in.

Mr. Blandford, do you have anything you want to say?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir; the Army would like to be heard on that point.

Mr. COLE. Should this not be in title 3?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir; if you are going to make it apply to both, it should be in title 3.

The CHAIRMAN. It should apply to both of them. But it ought to go in here and it ought to apply to all three services. We want it to show that you are not trying to bring into the service many more personnel than you can find places for down there, and you give somebody something to do for 8 hours instead of part of the time being spent in coffee hours and up and down the halls. It is a healthy provision and it strengthens the Department and Congress.

Later on I will call it up for the consideration of the committee.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say one thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Before the final decision is made by the committee on that, we would like to give the figures we have as respects the graded and nongraded. For example, as these airplanes are getting more technical, we are having more difficulty in getting top-graded supervisory electricians and top-graded supervisory service and maintenance people for these new and complicated engines and planes. If it is right, of course it is right, but if it is wrong in this division between graded and ungraded, then the taxpayer is losing a lot of money. We are having a very difficult time now in our maintenance and operation picture. Of course, some of that is due to the Berlin airlift problem. But nevertheless, I was very much impressed in a recent trip into Germany in the fact that we have not yet got the proper technical skill available in the Air Force that we would have if we had a better graded picture as against nongraded in the civilian set-up.

The number of civilian employees of the Air Force on December 31 was 157,799. Of these, 143,698 were subject to Public Law 106, Seventy-ninth Congress. The ceiling under Public Law 106, as determined by the Bureau of the Budget for this date was 147,400. Personnel strength fell short of authorization due to (a) normal administration lag necessary in operating under numerical ceilings rather than average allowable pay strengths; (b) restrictive nature of the limitation as imposed by Public Law 390, Seventy-ninth Congress.

Since unification the Department of the Army has transferred to the Air Force 51,696 graded positions of a War Department statutory ceiling of 176,000 provided by Public Law 390. The comparable December 31 civilian strength of this category was 50,962. The present ratio of employment of graded versus ungraded in areas affected by Public Law 390 is approximately at 5 graded to 7 ungraded. This represents a considerable shift in balance from the 1-to-1 ratio which experience proves to be desirable. To operate on the current 5-to-7 ratio has made necessary the manning with military personnel of some jobs admirably suited to civilian employees. Fire fighters, guards, vehicle operators, and many clerical positions have been subject to such a shift. This is an undesirable situation in that it is contrary to good personnel utilization practices. The graded restrictions become even more meaningless when by competent determination certain categories of jobs can be shifted from ungraded to graded status.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Blandford.

Mr. BLANFORD. Yes, sir. In order to be in a position to answer these questions on the floor. Mr. Secretary, or General, would you explain for the record how the Air Force arrived at the need for 35,000 Regular officers in comparison with your present authorization of 20,000 Regular Officers, and then would you explain how you intend to distribute those officers?

General VANDENBERG. May I have General Edwards, our personnel chief, answer that?

General EDWARDS. In our studies to arrive at the size of the personnel part of our commissioned structure, our objective was to have the minimum of Regular officers. There were three factors that influenced our studies on that matter. One was the necessity of having a certain part of the career officers or Regular officers with the idea of acquiring stability in the officers corps. What seemed to be a desirable ration was 1 to 1: One Regular for one Reserve officer, on extended active duty.

Another factor that influenced that was the necessity of having sufficient Reserve officers on active duty on a 3-year normal tour to insure a constant flow of Reserve officers into our mobilization Reserve. That influenced us in arriving at that, and a figure of about 35,000 Reserve officers seemed to satisfy that requirement.

We also had to arrive at a compromise whereby we would not spend too much of our effort in training. A Reserve officer who serves 3 years and goes back into civil life, you might say into the active Reserve in civil life, has to be replaced by another Reserve officer. So we did not want to use up too much of our strength or our resource, that is, manpower resource, in building up a tremendous training establishment. That was an additional compromise which led us to this ratio of 35,000 Regular as against approximately 35,000 Reserves.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Now, General, you are going to have the authority to distribute your present rank on the basis of an increased authorization, increased from 20,000 to 35,000. Is that going to mean that you contemplate some wholesale promotions or will the Secretary put limitations on that to keep the promotions down?

General EDWARDS. No, sir; by no means. Our plan to go to 35,000 officers would be to reach that figure—Regular officers—over a period of 10 years, say, 1960, and the whole problem can be revaluated from year to year as we come up with our budget yearly. And the grades and ratings and the numbers in any grade would only be relative to the particular increase in any particular year.

The CHAIRMAN. Now I have asked Mr. Blandford to suspend his questions now because I want to make a little brief statement in the record. Today at 12 o'clock there will be a speech on the floor about the distinguished career of Gen. Courtney Hodges, who enlisted as a private and wound up as a general. He is retiring today. So we will take a recess until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We have an appropriations hearing tomorrow at 10, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, we will take a recess until—when are you going to get through appropriations?

General RAWLINGS. We hope, sir, that the general hearing for the top staff will be over in 2 days.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we will hear the National Guard tomorrow and the Reserve.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, we would like to request that the gentlemen of the Air Force be present.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, they cannot be two places at one time. If you want to come here, you come here at 10 o'clock in the morning and we will hear you.

(Whereupon, at 11:50 a. m., the committee adjourned until Tuesday, February 1, 1949.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Tuesday, February 1, 1949.

(The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.)

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

This is a continuation of the hearings on H. R. 1437.

We have this morning the representative of the National Guard, General Reckord.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we were able to wire General Walsh at Chicago yesterday and get him here on a night train. So, with your permission, we would like you to hear General Walsh, president of the National Guard Association.

The CHAIRMAN. General Walsh?

General WALSH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, we will be glad to have you make any statement you desire with reference to this bill, H. R. 1437, wherein it relates to the National Guard.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. ELLARD A. WALSH, ADJUTANT GENERAL OF MINNESOTA AND PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION

General WALSH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if you please sir, I would like to have entered in the record the names of those who are here representing the National Guard today:

Myself, Maj. Gen. Ellard A. Walsh, the adjutant general of the State of Minnesota and president of the National Guard Association of the United States;

Maj. Gen. Milton A. Reckord, adjutant general of the State of Maryland and chairman of the committee on legislation of the National Guard Association;

Digitized by Google

Brig. Gen. Louis Evans Boutwell, of Boston, Mass., who commands the Sixty-seventh Fighter Wing, and who is chairman of the air advisory committee of the National Guard Association;

Brig. Gen. Charles R. Fox, the adjutant general of West Virginia and a member of the air advisory committee of the National Guard Association;

Maj. George J. Morey, the executive assistant to the president of the National Guard Association;

Maj. Allan G. Crist, the District of Columbia National Guard; and

Lt. Edmund F. Hogan, of the Air National Guard of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in connection with the matter now before this committee, H. R. 1437, I wish to say that we are in accord with the provisions contained in title I thereto. It is only with reference to certain provisions contained in title II that we find ourselves at variance, and there are certain matters that we should like to clarify.

It is not my intention to go into the details of the bill, but with the permission of the chairman and the members of the committee I should like to defer that presentation and have it made by General Reckord.

With reference to the accomplishments of the National Guard itself during the past 30 months in the matter of organization of its troop basis, I should like to have that handled by Maj. Gen. Kenneth F. Cramer, who is the Chief of the National Guard Bureau of the Department of the Army, and who is here this morning with his staff.

I do not believe that it is necessary to go into any extended presentation as to what would be involved if the language of title II stands as it is now written. Suffice to say that it would mean the federalization of the National Guard in part. And if the time should ever come when Congress permits the federalization of the National Guard in part it will only be a question of time until the National Guard is federalized in its entirety.

To me it has always seemed more than evident that the framers of the Constitution knew exactly what they were doing when they ordained the military system which we find laid down in the so-called Militia clauses and the Army clause of the Constitution.

During part of 1947 and a part of 1948, as you gentlemen are aware, there was brought into being by the Secretary of Defense a committee known as the committee on civilian components and commonly referred to as the Gray Board. They were given a directive by the Secretary of Defense, and based on that directive they brought out a report which was released to the public on the 12th of August 1948. In that report they submitted some 90 recommendations of which the No. 1 recommendation was the complete federalization of the Guard. They proposed that that be accomplished by the creation of a single Federal Reserve embracing the ground units of the National Guard and of the Organized Reserve Corps, and, secondly, by a consolidation or amalgamation of the Air National Guard and of the Air Reserve into a single Air Reserve Force.

On December 11, 1948, the Secretary of Defense submitted certain recommendations to the President of the United States, which are contained in his report, and he said it was not their intention at this particular time to urge or recommend the amalgamation or federalization of the Ground National Guard but he did urge and recommend the federalization of the Air National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. May I say, General—pardon me for interrupting—I don't think you need be disturbed about that as far as this bill is concerned, because, as was brought out yesterday, there is nothing in this bill with reference to the federalization of the National Guard or anything relating to the Gray Board.

General WALSH. No; but, Mr. Chairman, I submit if the language of title II stands as it is now written, and which puts into the hands of the Secretary of Defense all the power and authority with reference to the Air Reserve Force, then federalization of the Air National Guard will be accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. I disagree with you, because this makes it positive and certain that it is under the State control. This sets it up absolutely and beyond any shadow of a doubt under State control, that it is under State control, under the language that is put in the bill now. Then to do what you just said would require an act of Congress.

General WALSH. Maybe so, Mr. Chairman. But I can find no place in that section where the Air National Guard is specifically mentioned as such. Nor is there anything which would insure its integrity.

The CHAIRMAN. It says:

The United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 regular air groups, 22 separate Air Force groups, supplemented by 61 Air Force reserve groups.

General WALSH. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, doesn't that put it positively in the category of the ground troops?

General WALSH. In my opinion; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, in the opinion of the Air Force yesterday there was no doubt about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any other language, in your opinion, that you think encroaches on the autonomy of the National Guard, outside of 61 units as being part of the Air Force?

General WALSH. So long as there is no provision, Mr. Johnson, for the authority for the Air National Guard strength in title II of the bill, then in my opinion there is no provision.

But if it pleases the chairman, I would request that that matter be deferred and let General Reckord take it up when he goes into the analysis of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I wanted to get from you was: Can you point to any other specific language, or the lack of language, that encroaches on your jurisdiction?

General WALSH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. If he is going to cover it, I don't want to ask you about it——

General WALSH. The language in section 201, Mr. Johnson.

But, again, I will let General Reckord cover that, if you please.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

General WALSH. There seems to be, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a complete misunderstanding as to the troop basis of the Ground and the Air National Guard.

When General Marshall was Chief of Staff of the Army during the World War period he brought into being a Joint General Staff Committee on Policy, as provided by section 5 of the National Defense Act. That Joint Committee consisted of five Regular, five Guard, and five Reserve officers. And the gentleman who was chairman of that over-all committee was General Reckord, who is sitting here this morning. At that time he was Provost Marshal General of the European Theater. He was brought back by General Marshall to preside over the deliberations of that body. They finished their work with a unanimous report. There was no dissent.

And on October 13, 1945, these policies were promulgated and became known as the approved War Department policies of October 13, 1945, affecting the National Guard of the United States and the Organized Reserve Corps. Thus those policies became the Bible and it is in reference to those policies that we have proceeded all this time, and so has the Organized Reserve Corps.

It has been intimated that that committee determined the troop basis of the National Guard and the Organized Reserve Corps. That is not correct, because that committee had been dispersed and gone home for some 3 months before the troop basis was determined. The troop basis was determined by the Organization and Training Section of the War Department at that time, now the Department of the Army. And they gave to the National Guard a strength of 687,000, to be divided into two parts: The Ground National Guard and the Air National Guard. And here we are concerned with the Air National Guard in title II of this bill.

In those policies there were two basic assumptions: First, that there would be established a system of Universal Military Training, and, secondly, that the Federal Government would meet its fair share of the costs of providing housing, including armories. Neither one of these assumptions have been fulfilled.

And yet in this brief space of 30 months the National Guard has gone on to organize 5,000 units, both ground and air, and practically completed its Air National Guard program. The details of that accomplishment will be given to you by General Cramer, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

It has been intimated, too, that the National Guard had a hand in determining this troop basis and that the States asked for this tremendous troop basis. The States had no hand in doing it, and neither did the National Guard. And they were overwhelmed when they were given this troop basis, which was more than 300 percent greater than the troop basis which existed before the War. But assuming that these two basic assumptions would be satisfied, we agreed to go ahead, and we have done so.

It is now contended that there is no need in the States for an Air National Guard, that they have no State mission whatsoever—as stated by Mr. Forrestal in his report to the President on December 15, 1948.

We have never necessarily contended that there had to be a State mission for the Air National Guard. All we know, that we were given an allotment of 514 units which were to be contained in wings, groups, and squadrons, and we have completed 489 of those units. And the only reason at first that the States accepted those allotments was to the end that this Nation would have some semblance of an Air Force in being in the event emergency would arise and maintain them for the common defense, and for no other purpose. When they say they have no State mission, that is not true.

And I submit for your consideration what these units are now doing in the Western Plain States in connection with the terrible winter conditions which are prevailing from the Canadian border on down into Texas and Arizona. The same thing held true with the Ground National Guard.

If we carry this thing to its logical conclusion, we can say that the States have no need for artillery, for tanks, for heavy ordnance units, and a score of others.

We don't maintain those units for internal security. The internal security needs of the States could be satisfied when expressed in terms of infantry and some cavalry perhaps. But they have been maintained, and they are being maintained, for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is the common defense.

There are gentlemen here from the Organized Reserve Corps who will speak for themselves, but I have listened to their presentations on many an occasion, and they are the sharpest critics of all of the failures of the War Department to implement the Reserve program. Certainly nothing was done in the years 1920 to 1940, and not one single organized Reserve unit, as such, was activated for service in the World War. Almost 3 years and a half have passed since VJ-day and conceivably little has been done to implement the Organized Reserve Corps program.

As a member of the Guard, I submit that the Organized Reserve Corps has its proper place in the scheme of defense, and we support them whole-heartedly and without reservation in their attempts to achieve that proper place in the defense structure of the Nation.

There is much that could be said. I would like, if you will bear with me, to go into just one phase of what is now before us even if there is an attempt to federalize the Guard in part through the matter of the Air National Guard. And I submit that on the basis of the constitutional question. I think it is advisable that this committee should have this in mind.

I would like to read, with your permission, the statement which I made before the Gray board on the 26th of February, nearly a year ago:

> That the framers of the Constitution contemplated a standing army as the only Federal force is clear from the arguments advanced by Hamilton in the Federalist papers 24 to 28, inclusive, whereby he persuaded the States to accept the principle of a standing army large enough to accomplish the immediate purpose of the Congress only, its size to be controlled by limiting of appropriations to a period of 2 years only. He, that is Hamilton, also persuaded the States to agree not to keep troops in time of peace without the consent of Congress in exchange for the provision that the Congress should have power to provide for the organizing, arming, and disciplining—and by that I mean training—of the militia, and the States reserving only the power to appoint officers and the authority to train the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.
> Complete federalization would violate the principle on which the States bargained as above explained by giving the Federal Government in addition to its standing Army a part of the militia over which the State would have no power of control whatsoever, instead of the control provided for in clause 16, section 8, article I, of the Constitution. Nowhere in the Constitution is there any power given to the Federal Government to other than raise and support armies; and standing armies only were contemplated. No power was ever given to organize and support Federal militia, and none exists.

The guard over a period of more than 30 years has done everything that it has been called upon to do. It has accepted its troop allotments. It has organized those troop allotments insofar as the Congress would authorize or permit. In the last 30 months the guard has once again demonstrated its unparalleled genius for organization by accomplishing almost the superhuman or the impossible in bringing into being these 5,000 units that I mentioned, contained in 25 infantry divisions, 2 armored divisions, several hundred antiaircraft units, 18 regimental combat teams, and some 700 nondivisional units, plus an almost complete organization of its Air National Guard.

In World War I it gave to the Nation 18 divisions. In World War II it again gave 18 divisions, together with a host of corps and Army troops which were later organized into task forces.

I have no need to go into the performance of the guard in either of those wars. History speaks for itself. And the testimony of General Pershing before a joint meeting of the Senate and House Military Affairs Committees shortly after his return from France should settle that argument once and for all.

As to what the guard accomplished in World War II, the testimony of the wartime Secretary of War should suffice, when he said:

The National Guard has performed brilliantly on every fighting front and we look to it to be the bulwark of our national security.

I submit, in conclusion, gentlemen, that if the language as contained in title II, and notably section 201 remains as it is, it will only be a question of short order until the Air National Guard is federalized, if these things are left in the hands of the Secretary of Defense to determine. And once the Air National Guard is federalized it will only be a course of short time until the ground elements are federalized.

Now, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn the presentation over to General Reckord, who will speak specifically to the section in question, if I have your permission, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see if any members have any questions.

I want to thank you, General, for the clear-cut and fine statement that you just made. You have sewn a seed which will have to be carefully considered. You made a profound impression, I know, on me, by your logical and analytical discourse of this question.

But the one thought running through my mind is this: If what you say was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, that there should only be the Federal responsibility of a Regular Army is correct, then by what authority does Congress make appropriations to support the State National Guards?

General WALSH. I see no conflict whatever, Mr. Chairman. If we go back to the original Militia Act of 1792, and to the National Defense Acts of 1916, 1920, and 1933, it was the business of the Congress to support the militia to the end that they would be available in the event of need.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but you put the thought in my mind that our responsibility was only for the Regular Establishment, and that the function of the National Guard, both ground and air, was directly a State responsibility.

Digitized by Google

General WALSH. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If that be true, then why does Congress constantly make appropriations to help support the State National Guard? Why not leave it exclusively to the States to take care of?

General WALSH. That isn't correct, Mr. Chairman, and I certainly never intended to convey any such idea. Rather, the opposite.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be logical, would it not, if the only responsibility of the Congress is to preserve a Regular Establishment, to say then that there is no responsibility on the Congress to appropriate money for maintaining a National Guard?

General WALSH. Oh, I think quite the contrary is true. I think it is the responsibility of the Congress, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to provide for the National Guard, or the militia, as much as they do for the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. So do I. But, nevertheless, your line of reasoning, from your statement, led me to think that there was some ground for debate, by you pointing out so specifically that it was the duty of the Government to leave exclusively to the States the control over the National Guard.

General WALSH. Only in time of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

General WALSH. Only in time of peace, and then only with reference to the appointment of the officers and the authority for the training, which the Congress itself must prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you this one question: Hasn't the President appointed some board recently, headed by former Justice and Secretary Byrnes, to make some inquiry in regard to this subject matter?

General WALSH. Yes, Mr. Chairman. And as a member of that Commission, that is where I am supposed to be at this instant.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a member of that?

General WALSH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, everyone on that Commission has already fixed views?

General WALSH. I hope not.

The CHAIRMAN. If they have, I do not think we are going to get much aid and assistance from that group, if they are all going over there with one viewpoint.

General WALSH. And it should be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the Secretary of the Army's Committee on Civilian Components, commonly referred to as the Byrnes board, has only to do with the Army side. It has nothing to do with the air side. It is my understanding that the Secretary of Air has brought into being an ad hoc committee. And I believe there are two gentlemen on that committee who are here this morning: General Cramer and General Finch.

The CHAIRMAN. Who constitutes the board? Will you put that into the record?

General WALSH. I understand General Quesada is in the room. I didn't see him.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, was this board appointed by the President or the Secretary of Defense?

General WALSH. Secretary for Air.

The CHAIRMAN. No, I mean the board that was appointed——

General WALSH. You mean the Byrnes board?

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General WALSH. It was appointed by the Secretary of the Army, and in my directive, it stated with the approval of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. Then Secretary Royall has appointed a board to deal with the question of the National Guard in its relation to the Army?

General WALSH. All Reserve components, Mr. Chairman, and primarily to determine their future troop basis, if they can.

The CHAIRMAN. I see.

General WALSH. But I submit if they do they will have to be all Solomons.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no questions, then we will take General Reckord and let him make his statement.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. MILTON A. RECKORD, ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND AND CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION OF THE NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will endeavor to expedite my remarks and then answer any questions, if I may, with respect to sections of the bill under title II.

With respect to title II of the bill, H. R. 1437, pertaining to the Air Force, we find that it is very poorly drawn in a number of respects.

The CHAIRMAN. General, you are not going through this statement?

General RECKORD. Beg pardon?

The CHAIRMAN. You are not reading from this statement?

General RECKORD. I skipped part of it because General Walsh——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, let us start right at the top of it.

General RECKORD. Well, the first part, Mr. Chairman, pertains to section 1, which we covered yesterday and need not be touched upon today.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to start right out at the beginning. We have plenty of time this morning.

General RECKORD. All right, sir. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the National Guard has no objection to title I of this bill, as it has been amended. The bill gives the Army National Guard an authorized strength of 750,000. We did not ask for this authorization. For in the event of an emergency we can go to this strength without having to come back to Congress for authority to increase our numbers.

Then, too, the actual strength will be determined by policy and the amount of money appropriated each year. We have about 320,000 officers and men in the National Guard now, and we think we've done a good job. And I believe we will go on doing a good job.

As amended, title I of the bill is satisfactory to the National Guard because section 60 of the National Defense Act will continue to be the determining factor in the matter of units accepted by the States. We did have some reservations about title I until you amended it by striking out the authority of the President to apportion the National Guard strength when and as he saw fit.

That was agreed to, as you remember by the Department last week.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. I still believe, however, that we ought to insert a couple of words in section 103.

Mr. Chairman, that had to do with the word "armory," which you and I have discussed since.

The CHAIRMAN. And we will give you a hearing on that.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, we have the bill prepared in the language which we agreed to last May and we have not been able—I say "we," the Department has not been able, so we are advised—to get the bill out of the Bureau of the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. You give me the bill that you prepared and we will introduce it on our own responsibility.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then we will call the budget up later, while we are having the hearing.

General RECKORD. I will see you get that this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You give me the bill and we will have it introduced in the morning.

General RECKORD. Then we would like to pass over what appears at the bottom of this first page and the top of the second one, and come to title II of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General RECKORD. As I stated before, we think this bill is very poorly drawn.

In section 201, we invite your attention to a point made by Mr. Kilday yesterday wherein the term used——

The CHAIRMAN. Where is it, General? I can't find it.

General RECKORD. That is the middle of page 2.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, my eye caught the last sentence of the paragraph which the general has omitted, which I suggest that he read for our information.

The CHAIRMAN. Read it all through. It is a good statement. Don't be trying to get rid of any part of it.

General RECKORD. I was merely trying to save the committee's time.

The CHAIRMAN. We have plenty of time. Read this thing through so we can follow it.

General RECKORD (reading):

SEC. 103. The Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to procure the materials, including guided missiles, facilities, and armories—and so forth.

Putting the words "and armories" in there after "facilities" will permit us to use Federal funds so that ye can get the armories built. A year ago the Appropriations Committee of the House determined that the word "facilities" did not mean "armories." So we have been unable to get the armories built. I hope you can find the way to make this change.

But there is one thing about title I that we ought to keep in mind. Numerous critics before me have put the spotlight on the fact that no single agency ever has considered the over-all manpower problem of the United States; not only that of the Army, and the Navy, and the Air Force, and all of their components, but of industry, and agriculture, and education, and all of the other diverse elements that make up our national structure. Each service has figured out what it thinks it needs to do a job, and when you add all of the figures together you have a staggering total.

Now, only within the past few weeks the Secretary of the Army appointed a special committee, headed by Mr. James Byrnes, comprising a group of distinguished citizens and Regular, National Guard, and Reserve officers to carefully study the whole troop basis of the National Guard and the Organized Reserve Corps, in the light of changing conditions. Yet, if this proposed bill is rushed through your committee, the work of the Byrnes committee, which has not yet held its first meeting, will have been completely ignored. Keeping in mind that legal authority now exists for the composition of the Army and Air Force and their civilian components, I see no urgency for the enactment of H. R. 1437, and I suggest that this bill be laid aside, at least until Mr. Byrnes' committee has submitted its report.

Mr. COLE. That is the sentence to which I referred?

General RECKORD. Yes.

Mr. COLE. On that point, do you have any idea as to how long this delay might be while we await the Byrnes report?

General RECKORD. The Byrnes committee is having its first meeting today, and that accounts for the fact that we were able to get General Walsh here this morning.

The Quesada committee, on the Air Corps side, appointed by Mr. Symington, I understand has had its initial meeting, or maybe more than a single meeting. General Quesada is present in the room, and he could probably answer that better than I.

Mr. COLE. In view of your experience in dealing with matters of this nature over a period of years, do you have any estimate of the time that it might require for the Byrnes and the Quesada groups to submit their reports?

General RECKORD. Well, I should think certainly 60 days would cover it. It should cover it.

Mr. COLE. In other words, other similar boards in the past have completed their assignments—their missions—within that period of time?

General RECKORD. Congressman, I wouldn't want to go on record to that effect because if you keep in mind the Gray report, it took them 6 months or more. But these boards are dealing with specific subjects, rather than the over-all picture, and frankly and honestly, I think they should finish their job in 30 days, and if a real effort is made, I believe they can do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, General, may I say in response to the inquiry suggested by Mr. Cole, that I know of no legal authority for a 70-group force. Where is any authority that Congress has given to establish the 70-air group now?

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to tell the chairman what he should do. I am just pointing out the fact that these two committees are meeting now, and if they are going to do any good at all it does seem to me the committee should have the benefit of their studies. But that is for you gentlemen to decide.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, could I answer the question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. What harm would it do to have this bill passed, since the work of the Byrnes board is only to determine the troop allotments of the Ground Forces?

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Mr. Johnson, if this bill in section 2 is redrawn, it would do no harm.

But if you will permit me to analyze these two sections, I think I can show you definitely that it should be changed; that is, the section should be redrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are referring to title II?

General RECKORD. Title II, sections 201 and 202.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Before we leave that point, the only thing that troubles me about waiting for a board appointed by the executive branch of the Government is the implication that we are dependent upon the administrative branch in fixing the strength or size of our armed forces, because that is a matter of policy within the sole jurisdiction of the Congress, and of which I am very jealous. I don't want it to appear that we are dependent on what they say over there.

General RECKORD. Yes. I will strike that recommendation out of my statement.

Mr. COLE. Well, General——

The CHAIRMAN. I wouldn't do it. Let it stay.

Mr. COLE. Why back up after you have made a perfectly logical point?

General RECKORD. I am backing up only because I didn't want to sit here and tell the committee what they should do.

The CHAIRMAN. We are glad to have the benefit of your views because by the exchange of ideas the best results can be obtained. We don't have to agree with you, and you don't have to agree with us. We want a frank statement, and I compliment you for having a frank statement. I don't think you should strike it out.

General RECKORD. My first reaction when I learned the committee was about to hold hearings on this bill was to the effect that the result of the two studies being made in the Department of Defense could have no weight if the committee did not wait for those reports.

Mr. DURHAM. General, can't most of this information be secured from the National Security Resources Board, the Planning Board which covers this whole field?

General RECKORD. No, sir; I don't believe so.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, that is what it was set up for. It has been in existence for several years.

General RECKORD. Well, the troop basis plan, as I understand it, is: The committee is going to make a restudy to see whether they should come up with a different proposal which might take less officers and men; that is, strength.

Mr. DURHAM. It just looks like we are getting a duplication of per diem here, of boards scattered all over the place. There are more and more of them. Certainly the intention of Congress when the National Security Resources Board was set up, was to set it up for that purpose.

General RECKORD. I know the two committees are meeting, and it was my thought that out of their reports the committee could get something that would be helpful.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ELSTON. After all, General, this bill only seeks to fix a maximum.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. And if the report of the Byrnes committee does come along, it will in all probability be within the maximum fixed by this bill. If perchance it is beyond the maximum, it may be that the Senate would not have passed the legislation by that time and will give consideration to the report.

General RECKORD. That is correct, Mr. Elston.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Towe.

Mr. TOWE. General, do I understand that in addition to the Gray report, which we had last year, we now have a committee headed by Mr. Byrnes to deal with problems of the Army?

General RECKORD. On the Army side.

Mr. TOWE. And a separate committee appointed by the Secretary for Air to determine some of their problems?

General RECKORD. Headed by General Quesada of the Air Force.

Mr. TOWE. Those committees are not working together?

General RECKORD. Separate committees.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, go right ahead, General. Lead on. We are following you closely.

General RECKORD. Section 201——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait a minute. You have one sentence there—

With respect to title II of the bill H. R. 1437 pertaining to the Air Force, we find that it is very poorly drawn in a number of respects, and wish to invite your attention to such errors and suggest corrective language.

Now, take it up from there.

General RECKORD. In section 201, we invite your attention to a point made by Mr. Kilday yesterday wherein the term used "the United States Air Force," which under the provisions of the Unification Act, Public Law 253, section 208 (a), approved July 26, 1947, states—the United States Air Force is hereby established under the Department of the Air Force—bear in mind section 207 (a) of the same act states—within the National Military Establishment, there is hereby established an executive department to be known as the Department of the Air Force.

The term "Department of the Air Force," as used in the Unification Act, shall be construed to mean "The Department of the Air Force" in the seat of government and all field headquarters forces, Reserve components, installations, activities, and functions under the control or supervision of the Department of the Air Force. You will note, therefore, that the United States Air Force is the Regular Air Force, and it comprises those officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men who belong to the Regular Establishment together with those who may from time to time be ordered to active duty from the National Guard and the Reserve. The language of section 201 is not in step with this understanding.

Since 61 Air Force Reserve groups are covered into the United States Air Force, if that is the intention, it would be a very definite amendment to Public Law 253 which is now the law and which I have quoted above.

The National Defense Act, section 1, as amended, defines the Army of the United States as follows:

That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

From this it will be seen that the National Guard in time of peace is not a part of the Army of the United States.

Section 58, National Defense Act, defines the National Guard and also the National Guard of the United States. The National Guard is that part of the Organized Militia which is federally recognized by the Department of Defense. The National Guard of the United States is a reserve component of the Army of the United States, consisting of those federally recognized National Guard units, organizations, officers, warrant officers and enlisted members of the National Guard of the several States.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the general express that distinction in different words. I haven't been able to catch it as you have given it here in your statement.

General RECKORD. Mr. Cole, the National Defense Act, and the Constitution of the United States, provide for the militia. The militia is all able-bodied men between 17 and 45. The Organized Militia is that part of the militia that is actually organized into units. The National Guard is that Organized Militia which has been offered to the Government, and has been accepted, and federally recognized by the Department, and in turn they receive equipment and appropriations from the Congress. The National Guard of the United States is superimposed man for man on top of the National Guard of the several States, and the National Guard of the United States is a reserve component.

Mr. COLE. Well, are there organized units of the militia which are not recognized by the Federal Government?

General RECKORD. Every unit presented has to be first organized by the State. In that category it is Organized Militia. Then it is offered to the Department and accepted and becomes immediately National Guard, federally recognized.

Mr. COLE. Are there organized units of the militia which have not been recognized and accepted by the Federal Government?

General RECKORD. There would be very few, and at this time only those that are in process of being organized along the general plan for presentation for Federal recognition.

Mr. COLE. And is that the distinction between the National Guard and the National Guard of the United States? The National Guard consists of those organized units of the militia which have been recognized by the Federal Government. The National Guard of the United States includes all organized units of the militia, whether recognized by the Federal Government, or not?

General RECKORD. No, sir. You missed the point, Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. I still don't see the distinction, then.

General WALSH. General Reckord——

General RECKORD. Yes.

General WALSH. Mr. Chairman, could I inject something here which I think will answer Mr. Cole's question?

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. With pleasure, General.

General WALSH. If we go back to the act of June 3, 1916, which was the first of the National Defense Acts, and it was then amended by the act of June 4, 1920, it stated this, that the Army of the United States would consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard when in the active military service of the United States, and the Organized Reserves. The National Guard was never satisfied with that status and it desired that it be made a component of the Army of the United States at all times in peace as well as in war. So under the terms of the act of June 15, 1933, the Congress amended the National Defense Act by creating a brand-new reserve component of the Army of the United States known as the National Guard of the United States. And the law, as amended by the terms of the act of June 15, 1933, then stated that the Army of the United States would consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard of the several States when in the active military service of the United States, and the Organized Reserve Corps.

Now, the law further provided—that is the act of June 15, 1933—that the National Guard of the United States, which was wholly Federal, should be identical as to organization and personnel, with the National Guard of the several States, but the two could never be active at the same time. When the National Guard of the several States was active, as it was active from 1933 to 1940, then the National Guard of the United States was dormant.

But when the Congress enacted Public, No. 96, approved August 27, 1940, then the National Guard of the United States was ordered into the active military service of the United States, and remained therein for the duration of the war. And all that time the National Guard of the several States was dormant.

Then, on February 6, 1946, the Federal Government deactivated the National Guard of the United States, and ordered the National Guard of the several States to be organized. So it became active while the National Guard of the United States became dormant. Thus the two can never be active at the same time.

That is all covered——

Mr. COLE. Although they consist of the same individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General WALSH. And organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is the same organization.

General WALSH. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The National Guard and the National Guard of the United States is the same organization, but they function at different periods?

General WALSH. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

General RECKORD. I think I would definitely clear Mr. Cole's question if I read the definition in section 71 of the National Defense Act.

"National Guard or National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia" means that portion of the organized militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, active and inactive, federally recognized as provided in this Act, and organized, armed, and equipped in whole or in part at federal expense and officered and trained under paragraph 16, section 8, Article I of the Constitution.

Digitized by Google

Now, that is the organized militia federally recognized and known as the National Guard.

National Guard of the United States mean a Reserve component of the Army of the United States composed of those Federal recognized units and organizations and persons duly appointed and commissioned in the active and inactive National Guard of the several States, territories, and the District of Columbia, who have taken and subscribed to the oath of office prescribed in section 73 of this act and who have been duly appointed by the President in the National Guard of the United States as provided in this act, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me clear this up in my mind, General. If we were forced into war today, then the National Guard would automatically become known as the National Guard of the United States?

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, if we were in a minor emergency, Congress has authorized the President under certain conditions to call the National Guard as organized militia to active service. The minute they respond to that call, for that period, they are part of the Army of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. They become then known as the National Guard of the United States?

General RECKORD. No, sir; National Guard in the service of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. When do we get the group known as the National Guard of the United States?

General RECKORD. When the Congress shall have declared an emergency and shall have authorized the President to do so, he may order the National Guard of the United States into the Federal service.

Now, I can give you the two examples outstanding——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait one moment. Are they known today as the National Guard, or are they known today as the National Guard of the United States?

General RECKORD. Both.

The CHAIRMAN. Both?

General RECKORD. Both.

The CHAIRMAN. And the same group constitutes both organizations?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the Chair and I have a little seminar by ourselves——

The CHAIRMAN. But they can't function at the same time?

General RECKORD. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. So today we are functioning as the National Guard?

General RECKORD. In time of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. In time of peace?

General RECKORD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And in case of emergency they could still function as the National Guard called to the Regular Army?

General RECKORD. In the Mexican Border service we were called. In World War service we were ordered. It makes quite a distinction.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, what was the reason behind ever establishing the National Guard of the United States?

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, that goes back to World War I.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us not go that far back. I will withdraw my question, General.

General RECKORD. I will answer your question specifically: Many of us who were in the National Guard, and who were taken into the Federal service with the guard in World War I disliked very much the fact that although we held commissions and appointments we were drafted into the Federal service as individuals. So it took us from 1920 to 1933 to get the predecessor of this committee—this very committee—to see the wisdom of creating the officers and men who were in this organized militia known as the National Guard into a dormant organization in time of peace known as the National Guard of the United States, which by order could be brought into the Federal service.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman—right there, isn't that the whole point?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. The National Guard was dissatisfied with its status under the National Defense Act of 1920.

General RECKORD. Very much.

Mr. KILDAY. Because you are not a part of the AUS.

General RECKORD. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. And this was superimposed more or less to satisfy your wounded feelings?

General RECKORD. No doubt of that.

Mr. KILDAY. Therefore, it becomes very difficult to show a distinction.

General WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I can give you a better answer on that.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, what is your answer?

General WALSH. The Military Affairs Committee in 1920 said this:

> It was never intended by Congress when it passed the National Defense Act of 1916 that any power should be lodged in the War Department which would enable it to practically destroy the National Guard at one blow, for the War Department had assumed that power and by its arbitrary discharge from every obligation of State and nationl service of every unit of the National Guard which went into the Army during the war it has all but destroyed the National Guard.

General RECKORD. You see, Mr. Chairman, what happened—if you will permit me to go back to World War I again—I was a major at the time, and by order of the President we were all permitted to act in the capacity, although we had no Federal appointment, until such time as we could be federally appointed and commissions sent to us. My commission as lieutenant colonel never did reach me until I got back from the war, although I came home a colonel.

Now, we didn't like that.

And another big point was that because we had been drafted we had completed our obligation and been relieved of it in the State and when we came home from the war we were discharged as individuals and there was not even a skeleton upon which to build the new National Guard.

Now, section 111 of the National Defense Act is what we call our Army section, and it provides that when the Congress shall declare an emergency the President may order this Reserve component known as the National Guard of the United States into active service, and as far as practicable when the war is over these units shall march back into their respective States and communities, at least the framework, and start to build again.

But in 1933 we didn't contemplate a 5-year war. So when the guard units marched back from this war every enlisted man had served out his 3-year enlistment, because the war had lasted 5 years. So we had the officers upon which to start to build, and the War Department asked us to accept these allocations and begin to rebuild the guard.

Now, at that time the Air Corps was a part of the War Department, and the Air Corps' part of the Department offered the States certain Air Corps units and organizations. We have almost completed that organization. I would say it is about 95-percent complete, in 2 years. It is almost unbelievable, if we do say it ourselves. And yet there are people in the Pentagon who, they say in the interest of national defense, would destroy it. We say in the interest of national defense it should not be destroyed, and we are asking you gentlemen of Congress to see that we aren't destroyed. That is the nub of the whole thing.

The CHAIRMAN. In that connection, I fail to find anything in this bill which would upset that situation. And as I said to the previous witness it will require, as I understand it, specific legislation to do so because under the present set-up, from what you just said, you are organizing the Air Guard—and it is recognized by the Department as being under the jurisdiction of the States.

And there is nothing in this that I can interpret as being to the contrary, and the Department said positively yesterday there was nothing in the bill. That is the reason I have repeatedly said to you I didn't see why you were disturbed about this at this hour. You might be disturbed a little later on.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, if you gentlemen pass this bill it is the entering wedge.

Now, I ask you to let me read just this one sentence in section 201.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead now and read your statement straight on through.

General RECKORD. Let me read the statement that is pertinent to the remarks just made. [Reading:]

The Air Force of the United States * * *— that, bear in mind, is the second sentence in section 201, which purports to be a section about the United States Air Force. The first sentence covers the United States Air Force, and then the very next sentence is about the over-all force, in the same section. In the first sentence they deal with the Regular Air Force, and in the second sentence they say:

The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements, including tactical, administrative, logistic, air transport, and training, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized.

And as to hereafter in this bill, there is not one single man authorized for either the National Guard or the Organized Reserve.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ELSTON. General, wouldn't it follow as a matter of interpretation of law that since in section 101, where we authorize the composition of the Army, we specifically refer to the Organized Reserve Corps, and to the National Guard——

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. That if we don't do the same thing in title II, it might be considered that the Congress intended to ignore the National Guard and the Organized Reserve.

General RECKORD. Mr. Elston, I think there is no doubt about that.

And we are here to ask you to specifically authorize in separate paragraphs in title II the strength for the Air National Guard and strength for the Air Reserve similar to the way you have done it in title I.

Mr. ELSTON. Wouldn't it be reached simply by doing what we did in title I, and saying—and I am now referring to section 201—

The United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 Air Force groups and 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by—instead of 61—

34 Air Force Reserve groups and 27 Air National Guard groups

General RECKORD. No, Mr. Elston. You missed the point there.

The CHAIRMAN. If you put in there the National Guard, you accomplish it.

General RECKORD. If you rewrite this section you can easily accomplish it.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, I hadn't finished what I wanted to say.

General RECKORD. No, you missed the point.

Let me correct you: The United States Air Force is the regular Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. Now, if you had said the Air Force of the United States, see, which is in the second section, it is all inclusive. But we don't want the authority for the National Guard Air and the Organized Reserve Air to be under the term "United States Air Force," because we are not a part of the regular force.

Mr. ELSTON. Do you think the language "supplemented by" makes it a part?

General RECKORD. I think it would be much better if we did in this title what we did in title I.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, isn't that what we did in title I?

General RECKORD. Make them separate and distinct.

Mr. JOHNSON. General, you want the same language and categories for the Air Force as you made for the Ground Forces?

General RECKORD. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON. So each one is out there standing by itself.

General RECKORD. And we know——

Mr. JOHNSON. And it isn't supplemented——

General RECKORD. And we know, then, that the Congress intends the Air National Guard shall not be destroyed.

Mr. GAVIN. How would you have it read?

General RECKORD. Gentlemen, this bill is either poorly drawn or somebody has tried to be very smart.

Mr. ELSTON. It looks like section 101 might be poorly drawn because——

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. I am inclined to think it is the first. Nobody is trying to put a joker in this bill.

General RECKORD. Let me point out what I mean, Mr. Chairman.

This bill purports to supplement the Regular Air Force with 61 Reserve groups.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. I have just tried to point out to you the technical difference between the National Guard as Organized Militia and the National Guard of the United States as a Reserve component.

So the people, if they thought they were going to make it possible to take the National Guard Air away from the States under this bill, would do it this way. There was only one way they could do it, and that is by this over-all authority which this language will give to the Secretary of the Air Force to do as he pleases with the whole air organization, including the 61 Reserve units. He could gradually take funds and planes away from the National Guard unit and build up to 61 Reserve units, and then the National Guard Air would just be out on the end of the limb and die.

Now, if that is what they had in mind, and that is what this committee wants to see done, this bill will accomplish it. But other than that, this bill as drawn can't hamstring the National Guard in time of peace as long as we can go across the hall and get the Appropriations Committee to appropriate funds under the National Guard head.

But the thing we fear, Mr. Chairman, is with this authority—more authority than anybody else I would say including the Secretary of Defense because I am unable to understand this saving clause back here to save my life, I can't tell what it means—the Secretary of Air is given over-all authority to do as he pleases with all of the Regular Air Corps and these 61 Reserve groups, and all of the supporting troops.

To whom has this committee ever, except in time of war, given that much authority? Only to the President of the United States.

Now, I tell you, gentlemen, this legislation as drawn is dangerous. And we say that sincerely. We admit we don't want the National Guard Air to be destroyed.

And we have General Cramer here to show you what we have accomplished in 2 years.

The correct approach, if I may be so bold as to say it, would be to wait and let the Air Corps prove they can raise Reserve units and carry part of this load.

For 2½ years—General Evans is here, and I haven't conferred with him on this at all, but he will tell you, I know—the Regular Air Force has done almost nothing with the Air Reserve. General Cramer can give you the facts and the figures. You will see that the Regular Air Force has spent in the last 2½ years almost as many million dollars for what they have in the Reserve, and almost as many dollars as we have in the Guard, and compared to what we have given national defense it isn't a drop in the bucket. That is the reason we want you gentlemen to save us from being destroyed.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. General, the language which I suggested—I hadn't quite completed my statement—wouldn't that be sufficient, since it does follow generally title I, if you struck out the words at the conclusion of section 201, "as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force"?

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Yes, sir; if, Mr. Elston, you would go over to the next page and you would authorize strengths for the National Guard and the Reserve, as you have done in title I.

Mr. ELSTON. That obviously should be done.

General RECKORD. There are absolutely no strengths in here for the Reserve at all. And yet——

The CHAIRMAN. If it is 61, isn't it 61 groups?

General RECKORD. Sixty-one groups.

The CHAIRMAN. Isn't that the group?

General RECKORD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Wouldn't you want that broken down to so many National Guard and so many Reserve?

General RECKORD. I would say follow the change you made with General Bradley last week. Give us a total over-all strength. We are willing to make adjustments, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Now, let us see. Instead of having it 61, say 27 National Guard groups and 34 Reserve groups.

General RECKORD. But we think you ought to name the strength. You named the strength over here for the Regulars.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, when you put the groups, isn't that naming the strength, because that carries with it how much personnel?

General RECKORD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the whole thing.

Now, we could have said in regard to the National Guard, instead of saying 750,000 men, so many divisions and so many Army corps.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, that is just what you didn't do. You came in here with a bill—and I have the printed copy here somewhere where you did that—and General Bradley pointed out to you that he didn't like it that way, and you changed it for him.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General RECKORD. We are asking you to follow the same rule here.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, 27 National Guard air groups is the number; is it?

General RECKORD (turning to an associate). That is the correct number; isn't it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes——

General RECKORD. Twenty-seven groups.

The CHAIRMAN. What you want to do: 27 groups, consisting of so many officers.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And consisting of a certain number of men.

General RECKORD. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. How many men would that constitute?

General RECKORD. I think the total is something like 58,000.

What is it, General Cramer?

General CRAMER. Fifty-eight thousand one hundred and thirty-nine.

General RECKORD. Fifty-eight thousand one hundred and thirty-nine.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Then it would say in the bill that the United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 Regular Air Force groups, and 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by 27 National Guard groups composed of not exceeding 58,000 officers and enlisted men.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ANDERSON. That would go in section 102.

General RECKORD. That strength should go over in the next section, where you cover the strength for the Regular Air Force.

Mr. HARDY. You don't do that in section 102 with respect to the Regular Army.

General RECKORD. If you follow the same procedure in title II that you followed in title I, Mr. Chairman, it will be entirely satisfactory to us.

Mr. GAVIN. Why don't you make the suggestion, General, of just what you mean?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we listen to whatever recommendations the general has to offer with respect to amendments. They have given this problem thorough study and apparently the committee, for the moment at least, have a mind to cooperate. I think we ought to hear what the general recommends, rather than for us as individuals to be stabbing at it.

The CHAIRMAN. Let him finish his statement, Mr. Cole. Then we will take him up.

Let us not stop him any more. We are all at a little fault in stopping the general.

General RECKORD. I think I have fully covered the point you made, Mr. Kilday, with respect to the difference in the titles.

Mr. KILDAY. I think you covered the point.

General RECKORD. Between the Regular and the Reserve organi zations.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. Start on page 3, beginning with "section 60 of the National Defense Act," and read the balance.

General RECKORD. Section 60 of the National Defense Act provides that no change in allotment, branch or arm of units, organized wholly within a single State will be made without the approval of the governor of the State concerned. This proviso is for the protection of the State, once having accepted an allotment from the War Department, now the Department of the Army and the Department of the Air Force. It is the intent, the State having accepted a unit or organization in good faith, would not, at the whim and fancy of certain individuals in the Department of Defense, Army or Air, arbitrarily change that allotment.

The 61 Air Force Reserve groups should be mentioned in this bill separately and distinctly from the United States Air Force which is the Regular group, and we request your committee to give careful consideration to a further break-down of these 61 Air Force Reserve groups, similar to the way in which you approved title I on the Army within this same bill. We desire that section 201 be amended to provide authorization specifically for 27 Air National Guard groups and 34 Air Reserve groups with the necessary supporting and auxiliary units.

That is all we have to present on section 201.

I would like now to go on, if I may—or would the chairman rather I stick to my statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Go right on with your full statement.

85266—49—No. 12——9

General RECKORD. Again in section 201, I invite the attention of the committee to this language:

> The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements, including tactical, administrative, logistics, air transport, and training, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force, consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized.

That language, gentlemen, undoubtedly indicates that the total Air Force of the United States, that is, the Regular, National Guard, and Reserve, is to be whatever may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers hereinafter authorized.

I now invite your attention to the fact that only Regular Air Force is hereinafter mentioned. There is no mention later in the bill of a strength for either the Air National Guard or the Air Reserve. It is hard for me to believe the sections 201 and 202 have been drafted in error. In my opinion, the people in the Pentagon Building are too smart to make what at first appears to be a number of mistakes in these two sections. I think they have been deliberately drawn to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Air Force all authority to do as he pleases with the Regular Air Force, the National Guard Air Force, and the Reserve Air Force, without reference to anyone, except the over-all authority which this bill purports to give the Secretary of Defense in section 302. Certainly the language in section 201 would be construed to amend the pertinent paragraphs of the National Defense Act.

Only a few days ago I was told by General Vandenberg that the Air Force did not wish to take the authority over the Air National Guard away from the governors. Only last week in this very room following one of the hearings, this statement was repeated to me by General Quesada. We have asked Mr. Symington, the Secretary of the Air Force, to give further study to the federalization of the Air National Guard as we believe everything that they say they desire can be done without federalizing the Guard. Mr. Symington has named a committee for the purpose of further studying the subject, just as Mr. Royall, Secretary of the Army, has named a committee to make a restudy of the troop basis plan of the Army. In the light of what has been done, we request that your committee take time to rewrite title II of this bill rather than let the bill be hurriedly passed without the necessary corrections having been made.

With respect to section 202, we wish to invite the attention of the chairman and gentlemen of the committee to the fact that here again a mistake in drafting has been made, since the term "the Air Force of the United States" is used when it is quite evident what is intended is "the United States Air Force." Again I refer to the question asked yesterday by Mr. Kilday in which he pointed out the difference between "the United States Air Force" or "the United States Army" and "the Air Force of the United States" or "the Army of the United States." The way section 202 is now drawn, it includes in the term "Air Force of the United States," without intending to do so, both Reserve components and all Reserve individuals. Yet in the second line, it speaks of authorization for an active-duty strength and includes within the section only Regular Air Force personnel. It is quite evident, therefore, that this section should read "the United States Air Force" rather than "the Air Force of the United States." This section says nothing about the personnel strength of the Air Reserve elements. I believe that as it was thought wise to set National Guard and Reserve authorized personnel strengths in title I on the Army side of this bill, then it is just as wise to set similar personnel strengths for the Air Force Reserve elements in title II. We suggest, therefore, an additional section, or two sections; one, to cover the National Guard, another to cover the Reserve.

When the composition of the postwar National Guard was being discussed back in 1945 the Federal Government itself asked the States to take on the job of organizing and creating an air branch of the National Guard on a scale never before dreamed of. The States agreed to do this and they have done a magnificent job.

They agreed to organize and recruit 514 units in 12 wings, and 27 groups, with the necessary aircraft control and warning groups and supporting services. We now have organized 488 of these units in 43 States, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. In other words, 95 percent of our unit goal has been federally recognized. We have recruited, voluntarily, 36,769 officers and men.

There is one other thing I want to say about the Air Guard at this time:

General Stratemeyer, the commanding general of Continental Air Command, himself has said that the Air National Guard represents two-thirds of the fighter defenses of the continental United States.

Some of you gentlemen may recall the 20th of January. On that day, if you were present for the inaugural ceremonies and parade, you saw 300 fighter aircraft of the Air National Guard sweep over this city in aerial formation. And they represented only a fraction of the fighter aircraft that the Air Guard can mount. These fighter planes came from 25 States and the District of Columbia.

The Air Force Reserve at present is practically on paper only. Yet the Air Force Reserve is under the direct supervision and control of the Regular Air Force. I don't have to tell you how the Reserves are complaining at the lack of interest in their program by the Army and Air Force. This committee has heard those complaints for years. Right now, more and more fine young Air Force Reserve pilots and technicians are beating at the doors of the Air National Guard trying to get in. They want to be part of a going concern.

But here we have a proposal which would scrap this fine, going concern of the Air Guard and ask this Congress and this Nation to put all of their faith in glowing promises and a paper organization.

Now, gentlemen, that is no reflection upon the Reserve whatever, but it is a definite reflection upon the Regular Air Establishment which has failed to do their duty by the Air Reserve.

I think this is a slap in the face to the National Guard. In all my years in military life this is the first time I have ever heard of being penalized for accomplishing a mission successfully.

As stated above, these sections must be rewritten.

Section 203 is designed to authorize 24,000 serviceable aircraft.

The only thing we would like to point out with respect to this section is, we would like to know if this language includes aircraft for all organizations of the National Guard and the Organized Reserve, because there is nothing in the section which indicates whether it does or does not.

Digitized by Google

We now come to section 301—Appropriation authorization. A careful reading of this section will indicate that it authorizes appropriations necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, but unless this bill is so amended as to provide for a strength of National Guard and Organized Reserves in the Air Force of the United States, which the bill does not now do, this authorization covers only the Regular Air Force. We do not believe this is the intent of the committee.

I come now to section 302, which is headed "Saving provision." The National Guard strongly supports the plan for unification of the forces within the National Military Establishment. We support the principle that the Secretary of Defense should be given additional authority and stronger control than he now has under Public Law 253. Notwithstanding our position on these matters, we are of the opinion that section 302 should not be enacted into law as at present drafted. As we read this section, it would make a czar or dictator of the Secretary of Defense. With the authority proposed in this language, the Secretary of Defense could in our opinion cancel out every other provision of the bill. We believe the section should receive further careful study and be rewritten. To enact it as now drawn might defeat the purpose of the legislation that is being proposed.

Mr. Chairman, we are very grateful to you for giving us this opportunity to be heard.

And I would like now, if you will permit us to do so, to have the committee hear General Cramer with respect to what has actually been accomplished in 2 years in the Guard. He has brought a chart, or charts, that will take him only a few minutes to go over.

The CHAIRMAN. Just before we do that, may I make this statement:

To sum up your observation on this bill and the defects from your viewpoint that have been disclosed by your statement, I think you are clearly justified in concluding that the bill has been very poorly drawn.

I thoroughly agree with you in one section of your comment with regard to section 302.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think your interpretation is absolutely correct. I think it would make a czar or dictator of the Secretary of Defense. I am glad that I find myself thinking along that line like you do. Go ahead with your next witness, unless there are some questions by members of the committee.

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. General, I want to thank you for your statement. It is a very fine statement, indeed. I hope I will be able to keep the difference in mind between the Air Force of the United States and the United States Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, you make to the committee any statement you desire to in reference to the bill.

General CRAMER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Give your official position in the Military Establishment.

General CRAMER. My name is Kenneth F. Cramer, major general, Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. KENNETH F. CRAMER, CHIEF OF THE NATIONAL GUARD BUREAU

General CRAMER. In a period between the wars, the Air National Guard, which was at that time a part of the National Guard, consisted of 29 observation squadrons with a total personnel of about 4,800, manning 252 airplanes of the old observation type, mostly Douglas. These squadrons were largely attached to division aviation for observation purposes.

When World War II had been completed and the task of reorganizing the National Guard initiated, we were assigned some 12 fighter wings, in 27 groups and in 84 squadrons, with 72 of these squadrons being fighter squadrons and 12 being light bombardment aviation. Likewise, 24 of the group were fighter groups and 3 light bombardment groups. At the same time we were also assigned a 12-aircraft control and warning group set-up, with supporting units to round out the picture.

I would like to have the first chart, showing the tactical units.

Questions were asked yesterday, or the day before, relative to the location of some of the units of the Air National Guard. This map here shows the location of the 12 tactical wings, the 27 tactical groups, and the 84 squadrons of the Air National Guard. Each State, each Territory, and the District of Columbia, has either a fighter or a light bombardment squadron.

After that distribution had been made, the remainder of the strength allotted to the Air National Guard was divided among the States and Territories generally on the basis of the military populations of the various States.

That gives you the picture, gentlemen, of the 12 wings. And may I say at the present time that of the 12 wings, 8 are completely organized, excepting in one case for an aviation engineer company in Michigan which is in the process of organization, and 4 wings are almost completely organized. Twenty-six of the group are organized, and one group in Pennsylvania is in the process of being organized.

Now, if you will show the locations——

Mr. KILDAY. Is this the way it exists, or is this the way it is planned, General?

General CRAMER. This is the way it exists, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could I ask a question there?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Those Twelfth and Fourteenth Air Forces—are they similar numbers to the Regular Air Force?

General CRAMER. No, sir. That is confusing, Mr. Johnson. It might very well have been left off. But it shows that, for instance, in the Fourth Air Force, where you reside—that section—we have a wing in the Northwest: In the States of Montana, Idaho, Washington, and Oregon; we have a wing in northern California, which also includes Nevada and Utah; then a wing in southern California, which includes the State of Arizona, I would say.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, does the Fourth Air Force refer to the National Guard Air Force?

General CRAMER. No, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. JOHNSON. Or does that refer to the Regular Air Force?

General CRAMER. It refers to the Regular Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say that practically every State, except probably one or two, had established a National——

General CRAMER. Every State, Mr. Chairman, now has a federally recognized unit of the Air National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how does a State proceed to get one? Do they apply to you, or who do they apply to?

General CRAMER. The original allocation was made in the manner that I just described, namely, either a fighter squadron or a light bombardment squadron to each State. Then the remaining units of the 514 were allocated on the basis of population. They were then accepted by the governors under the provisos which General Walsh earlier referred to. Having accepted the allotment, then the adjutant general of each State makes application to the Chief of the National Guard Bureau for specific authority to organize the unit previously allotted and accepted. They then go through the period of preorganization and upon the completion of that period, which is within 60 days of the request for authority to organize, they are presented for Federal recognition before a board of Regular Air Force officers.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are the officer that they get in touch with, and you in turn get in touch with the Army and the Air Force in carrying out the policy?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Everything in the National Guard—the Ground Force and the Air Force—is channeled through your office, and you have direct command—I wouldn't say direct command, but you have the supervision and administration and the carrying out of the rules and regulations adopted by the Army and the Air Force. It all comes through you.

General CRAMER. Yes, sir; that substantially defines the duties of the Chief of the Bureau, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the General?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hébert.

Mr. HÉBERT. General, as I understand it you have 48 National Air Guard units.

General CRAMER. Fifty-one, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. Fifty-one?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. Including the District of Columbia and Hawaii?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. And they are subdivided into 27 Air Guard groups; is that correct?

General CRAMER. Well——

Mr. HÉBERT. I just wanted to reconcile the figures of 51 units and 27 groups.

General CRAMER. Let me restate that, Mr. Hébert: There are 51 States and Territories in which there is at least one squadron of a fighter or a light bombardment type, with certain allied units which are organic to the squadron. Then the remainder of the units, of the 514, are allocated on the basis of population and go to make up certain tactical organizations such as the 12 wings and the 27 groups, as well as the 12 aircraft control and warning set-ups, to which we have referred to here.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HÉBERT. Where do you arrive at the figure of 27 groups?

General CRAMER. Those, Mr. Hébert, are the groups comprising two or more fighter or light bombardment squadrons.

Mr. HÉBERT. In other words, you can have three or four State units merged into one group?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir; we do that, as a matter of fact.

Mr. HÉBERT. I see.

General CRAMER. That is, excluding Hawaii and Puerto Rico, the States support—well, there are 48 States and the District of Columbia—12 tactical wings and 27 tactical groups.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could I ask one question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. General, in every State the adjutant general has supervision of the Air Forces and the Ground Forces. They don't have a separate air arm in the States—any of them—is that correct?

General CRAMER. That is correct. Under the governor of each State, the adjutant general heads the military department and is responsible for the organization and administration within that State of both the Army National Guard and the Air National Guard. That is correct.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, your contact is with the Ground Forces and with the Air Forces in Washington?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are the responsible person there, as the chairman pointed out.

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. General, with respect to the personnel, are the pilots all veterans of World War II?

General CRAMER. The commissioned personnel, Mr. Van Zandt, is secured from among people who held a similar position, or a position of corresponding or equal responsibility during the war. They must either have been commissioned personnel, or they must have been noncommissioned officers in the first three grades.

Now, that means that at the present time that all officers in the Air National Guard—and the same is true on the Army side—with the exception of a few dentists, doctors, and chaplains, who are specialists, are those who have had previous service in World War II.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Well, is it true that your pilots are all combat veterans?

General CRAMER. A very, very large proportion of the pilots are combat veterans; yes, sir.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. What about the enlisted personnel in connection with maintenance?

General CRAMER. That is likewise true.

On the Army side, 30 percent of our enlisted personnel are World War II veterans, which means that practically all of our noncommissioned officers are World War II veterans.

I haven't the exact figures for the Air National Guard, but the ratio there, Mr. Van Zandt, is noticeable higher.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. How many hours a month do these pilots put in?

General CRAMER. At least 8½, and as much as 12, as a rule.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. General, would it embarrass you if I asked you one or two questions in reference to the statement of General Reckord?

General CRAMER. Would it embarrass me, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General CRAMER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

What is your viewpoint in reference to the hesitancy of the committee reaching a decision until the achievements of these two boards set up by Secretary Royall and Secretary Symington have had an opportunity to go over the matter?

General CRAMER. Mr. Chairman, with respect to that general question, we of the National Guard, and particularly those of us in the National Guard Bureau, are desirous of having some of these questions solved at a very early date.

Now, without desiring to go too much back into the history of the organization of the National Guard, the very day following the date on which I was sworn in as Chief of the Bureau, the question of the federalization of the National Guard was proposed. I came to Washington, as I conceived it, to do a job with respect to the organization of the National Guard. The next day the federalization of the National Guard was proposed. And I have had to contend continuously and advance the organization of the guard under that handicap.

I feel that what has been accomplished is a remarkable tribute to the fact that the people in the various States, and out in the field, refuse to be discouraged under those conditions and circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to have some of these problems decided at a very early date.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean by enacting some bill, or by waiting for the report?

General CRAMER. Well, either or both, Mr. Chairman, in the judgment of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. What is running through my mind is this: It seems to be the drift of thought in connection with these matters that we might go into that field ourselves somewhat. We have already two and one more from this committee might not muddy the water any more than it will be. It might be a good idea for this committee to have a subcommittee appointed to go into this whole question of Reserves, so we can keep pace with the times and have a little inquiry about it before we do anything in regard to this matter.

General CRAMER. Mr. Chairman, may I add further that we could continue to operate——

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

General CRAMER. Under the same conditions that we have been operating.

The resolution of these questions is important with respect to the future of the guard as a whole. And I address myself to that particular point and trust that your committee will come up with an early decision on some of these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. You put the same construction on the language here commented on by General Reckord that he does.

General CRAMER. Substantially so; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You find yourself in agreement with him on that construction?

Digitized by Google

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You, then, reach the conclusion that it would not be under the terms of this bill necessary to carry out the Gray Board's report because this would accomplish exactly what the Gray Board reports——

General CRAMER. I think there is a very strong likelihood of that under the provisions of the present bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

General CRAMER. There is a very strong likelihood of that under the provisions of the particular bill in question.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Whether likely or not, is it possible?

General CRAMER. Sir?

Mr. KILDAY. Whether likely or not, it is possible under the terms——

General CRAMER. Quite possible, in my opinion, Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Under the legal construction of the terms of this bill.

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. You are directing yourself to the Air Force question?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. It couldn't be accomplished under the present language for the Ground Force.

General CRAMER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt about it.

Then, you think this accomplishes practically what has been written in the paper that the Gray Board made, recommending federalization, or it leaves an opportunity for the Secretary to do so?

General CRAMER. It certainly moves in that direction and admits of that possibility, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, you think it would be proper to spell out in this bill 27 National Guard air group units, and so many Reserves, plus the men?

General CRAMER. I think that is a much preferable course.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, there would be absolutely no doubt that it was the intention of Congress to establish separate and distinct from the Regular air group a National Guard?

General CRAMER. Beyond doubt, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And then it would be administered in accordance with section 60 of the National Defense Act.

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That would make it positive and certain, so there would be no doubt about it.

General CRAMER. Correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions by any other members of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. General Cramer, were you taken into consultation in the preparation of the budget—that is, your department?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. You were?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Havenner.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I can't read the captions on that map from here, but the way the lines are distributed on the map it would appear that the Pacific coast line is not going to receive anything like the amount of protection from the standpoint of national defense that the Atlantic coast line is receiving under this program. I am just wondering whether that is true, and if it is true whether it would be possible to give some consideration to it, perhaps in this subcommittee that you are suggesting.

General CRAMER. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman himself asked a question of the United States Air Force of the same nature.

May I say—speaking now for the National Guard Bureau, and for the National Guard—that we have the capability, sir, of organizing a substantial number of additional squadrons for the Air National Guard. Several States have requested authority to proceed with such organization. If authority is granted to the National Guard, we have that capability, Mr. Chairman. And that will be our answer to Mr. Havenner.

Mr. HAVENNER. They weren't taken care of at the beginning of this last war, Mr. Chairman. I live right at the Golden Gate, and I can tell you——

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

I will recognize our other colleague from California, Mr. Doyle. Any questions?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Speak up. California is in the picture.

Mr. DOYLE. Isn't it a fact, General, that your office has a record of the fact that California is asking for additional units? I am from southern California, and I have personal knowledge of the fact that that is true. Isn't it a fact?

General CRAMER. That is true, to the best of my recollection, sir.

Mr. DOYLE. So that under proper authorization, if there was activity enough from California, there could be additional units from that State?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir. That is true of several other sections. I think the State from which the chairman comes is initiating a request. Alabama has initiated a request.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but that is what is worrying me. May I interrupt. If we spell out this, and just say 27, both California and Georgia might be left out of the picture.

General CRAMER. May I comment on that?

The CHAIRMAN. And that sort of worried me, because I am hoping to be in on this picture somewhere.

General CRAMER. Mr. Chairman, if it is the decision of your committee to spell that out, we would like the opportunity to present to you an authorization sufficiently high above the 27 so we can do just that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are going to fix it so that everybody will be satisfied?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. I think the general, in his plans, has planned it on the strategic situation. You certainly planned it along that line, and not the question of location in a certain State.

General CRAMER. In answer to that, those decisions, sir, are made at a higher level than in the National Guard Bureau. The original plan was conceived by the United States Air Force, and I am sure that they took into consideration their strategic conceptions prevalent at that time.

Digitized by Google

We do not participate in that type of planning, but that having been decided our work begins after those decisions have been made.

Mr. DURHAM. You certainly should participate in it, if you don't.

General CRAMER. Beg pardon?

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly you have the authority, or a certain amount of authority, for the location of these units. Aren't you taking on the strategic planning of this internal defense?

General CRAMER. We are getting into another matter when we get into internal security or internal defense.

Mr. DURHAM. Well——

General CRAMER. But the location of these, the specific locations of these, is a matter upon which both the various States and the United States Air Force have come into agreement before any particular organization has been located.

Mr. DURHAM. They are more than just training units.

General CRAMER. Oh, yes, sir. They have a very definite mission.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Doyle.

Mr. DOYLE. General, as I understand it, though, the location of these units is entirely a decision in the hands of the governor and the adjutant general in the respective States.

General CRAMER. That is not entirely so. The specific locations are determined in the first instance through the availability of the population necessary to man and maintain the units. Then there is some thought given to the availability of facilities on which these units can be based. Thereafter the exact location is a matter in which the governors and the United States Air Force, or the governors through the adjutants general and the United States Air Force, must be in agreement insofar as the specific location of any units is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions, Mr. Doyle?

Mr. DOYLE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. deGraffenried, any questions?

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. I would like to ask what units at present are located in Alabama and what request for additional units has been made?

General CRAMER. The headquarters of the One Hundred and Seventeenth Fighter Group; headquarters detachment of the Two Hundred and Seventeenth Air Service Group, Fighter; One Hundred and Sixtieth Fighter Squadron; One Hundred and Sixtieth Utility Flight; One Hundred and Sixtieth Weather Station; Detachment B, Two Hundred and Seventeenth Air Service Group, Fighter; One Hundred and Sixth Light Bombardment Squadron; One Hundred and Sixth Utility Flight; One Hundred and Sixth Weather Station; Detachment C, Two Hundred and Sixth Air Service Group, Light Bombardment.

These are units which are now based in Alabama, comprising 100 percent of the original allocations to Alabama, sir.

I have been in communication with your adjutant general, and he has asked for consideration with respect to the locating of additional squadrons in Alabama.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Is that the usual group, located in Alabama? Does that about conform to the other groups that have been located in other States?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir; because the organic allocation to Alabama would be one squadron, and that has been boosted in accordance with Alabama's over-all population, and the relationship of that population to the relationship of the population of the rest of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clemente, any questions?

Mr. CLEMENTE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Winstead?

Mr. WINSTEAD. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Price?

Mr. PRICE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Any members any questions?

Mr. ANDERSON. Let us see the rest of the map.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes. Does that cover your statement, General?

General CRAMER. I do have some other points, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead, sir.

General CRAMER. Of the 514 units originally allocated, 95 percent have been organized and federally recognized and the Air National Guard is 100 percent complete in all but four States. In other words, 47 States and Territories have completely organized the units allocated to them.

Of the 58,138 men set as the goal toward which we would move, we have appointed 5,462 officers and enlisted an aggregate of 36,769 officers and men.

Mr. KILDAY. What is that figure that you gave?

General CRAMER. Fifty-eight thousand is the ultimate goal.

Mr. KILDAY. Officers and men?

General CRAMER. Officers and men. We have 36,769, or 63.2 percent enlisted on a voluntary basis. That same figure is 89 percent of the 41,000 for which our present budget provides.

We also have, as far as equipment is concerned, 70 percent of the technical services equipment necessary to completely equip the guard, and 67 percent of the Air Force equipment necessary. We have 80 percent of the airplanes, and 100 percent of the spare engines.

With particular reference to aircraft, we have 2,208 aircraft, of which 1,812 are fighter type—either 47's, 51's, or jet-propelled aircraft, and of the latter category we have 103 in five different squadrons.

We are presently based on 78 different airfields, 16 of which are federally owned, 8 State-owned, and 54 publicly owned either by counties or by minor political subdivisions, or in the case of one airfield, by a private corporation. The facilities from which the Air National Guard is now flying would, if they had to be replaced, that is aside from the Federal facilities, involve a replacement factor of $804,000,000. In other words, gentlemen, we are using fields, State-owned and governmentally owned other than States, that have a replacement value of $804,600,000.

Having secured the leases for these nonfederally owned fields, we have then negotiated in the case of 97 which cover some aircraft control and warning facilities in addition to aircraft service contracts covering services rendered by the owners of the airports to the Air National Guard.

I have some other figures here with respect to how we conduct or care for our aircraft, how we handle our supply problems, and how we handle our administrative problems, but I think I will simply make the observation, gentlemen, that all of those matters are handled by personnel from within the Air National Guard. They are employed on a civilian status but they must be members of the National Guard, either commissioned or noncommissioned, and they will go out with the National Guard in the event of its mobilization.

We have been provided by the United States Air Force with 62 percent of the officer and noncommissioned officer personnel necessary to supervise the training and to assist the guard in an instructional capacity.

Now, you might ask me: How do we stand with respect to training because after all training is the purpose for which the National Guard is organized? In the fiscal year 1949, out of 183 field training inspections, and these inspections, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, are made by officers of the Regular Air Force, every unit was rated as satisfactory.

Now, in the fiscal year 1948 and 1949, out of 283 annual air-base inspections—performed by Regular personnel as well—267, or 94 percent, were found satisfactory; 14, or 5 percent, were found unsatisfactory; and 1 was nonrated.

General Finch reminds me that there are only two ratings given. The unit is either satisfactory or unsatisfactory.

And these inspections run to all aspects of the situation in any unit. It runs to an inspection of the administration and of the supply and of the training, as well as an inspection of facilities.

I would like to summarize by saying that there has been expended for the purposes of the Air National Guard since it was reorganized the sum of $154,845,000. With that sum we have organized 488 units, or 95 percent of the job accomplished. We have appointed or enlisted 36,769 officers and enlisted men, or 62.3 percent of the job completed. We are training on facilities furnished by governmental agencies, and under the Federal Government, of a replacement value of $804,000,000. And when the program is complete, with the addition of the other units, we will need to have acquired three additional facilities.

Now, we have secured Air Force equipment—it has been issued to us—worth $84,000,000, and technical services and equipment, coming mostly through the Army, of $123,000,000. So we believe, gentlemen, that when you balance that off against the original cost, because much of this equipment was procured on a nonreimbursable basis, you will realize that we feel, and we may take some pride in believing, that a good job of organization has been done by the States and by the National Guard for the United States Air Force in the creation of the Air National Guard within the short period of time which has been available to us.

The CHAIRMAN. General, let me ask you this question: You say some one-hundred-and-some-odd million dollars has been available last year, since the organization?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir; $154,000,000.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. $154,000,000. How much is in the budget this year?

General CRAMER. $116,000,000, sir—I am corrected; that is $115,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And that applies to the Ground and to the Air?

General CRAMER. No, sir. That is Air National Guard only.

The CHAIRMAN. Air National Guard only?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in the budget, how is it written out? Is it set out separately and distinct as Air National Guard, or is it set out in the Air Corps?

General CRAMER. This is a sum appropriated to the National Guard Bureau for the purposes of the Air National Guard—$115,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the budget give to you the amount of money that you requested?

General CRAMER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What amount did you request?

General CRAMER. I can't give you that at the moment, but I will be glad to provide it.

The CHAIRMAN. But you will not be hampered very much by carrying out your magnificient oragnization with what you have in the budget today.

General CRAMER. We can do a job with the money available. We honestly believe we could do a better job with more money.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course. But you won't be very much hamstrung by the amount of money that you have been given today. You will be able to do a pretty good job with that.

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is what?

General CRAMER. $115,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. $115,000,000 for the next fiscal year?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir; 1950, sir. That is fiscal year 1950.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir.

Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, sometimes they transfer funds. Unless there is a restriction in the appropriation bill would these funds be subect to transfer?

General CRAMER. In the fiscal year 1946, or 1947—in the fiscal year 1947, I am advised—there was created for the over-all purposes of the National Guard, $110,000,000. A transfer of some $60,000,000 was made for the purposes of the pay of the Army and for the Medical Department. Some of that was subsequently restored to the National Guard Bureau, and I believe that corrective legislation was passed authorizing the transfer, which was made.

Since that time, Mr. Kilday, there has never been a suggestion of any transfer of funds after appropriation to the National Guard.

Mr. KILDAY. What year was that?

General CRAMER. That was in fiscal year 1947.

Mr. KILDAY. Just one more question, General: These men that you have enlisted in the Air National Guard, if they were transferred to the Reserve could they be held to their commissions?

General CRAMER. When an officer accepts a commission in the Air National Guard, or when an enlisted man is enlisted in the Air National Guard, he takes a dual oath. He takes an oath to the governor of his State and he takes an oath to the President of the United States. And we believe that thereby a triple relationship is set up, a relationship which is in time of peace a dual relationship only between the individual and his State, which may be in time of war translated into a relationship between the individual and the Federal Government. Our conclusion is that that being a contractual relationship, it would have to be abrogated, or it would have to be agreed to by the individual in every specific case before that could be accomplished.

Mr. KILDAY. In other words, if a status as a National Guard man was changed, he would be a free agent?

General CRAMER. That is my conclusion, Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. General, is the National Guard insisting on the same physical standards, particularly for the pilots, that are insisted upon by the Regular Forces?

General CRAMER. Yes, sir.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Elston, the method of federally recognizing our pilots is such that while the initial physical examinations are performed in the States, an accredited flight surgeon must make the examination for the pilots. Now, they are processed through to the National Guard Bureau, and by the Bureau to the United States Air Force, so the surgeons of the United States Air Force pass on the physical fitness of every potential pilot, as well as his other qualifications.

Now, we must appreciate the fact that in the beginning all of these men were AUS or ROTC pilots.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, the Air Corps lays out the qualifications and directs the training, and it all comes from a higher echelon than your office.

General CRAMER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Every phase of it. And you are merely the instrument by which the directives are carried out in all phases of your training, your procurement, and everything, in regard to the National Guard Air.

General CRAMER. That is a fair generalization, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, you have certain powers.

General CRAMER. Yes, sir. If we were going to explore that subject in detail, I would want to qualify it.

The CHAIRMAN. But as to physical conditions, the hours he has to fly, and the training he has to take, it is all mapped out by General Vandenberg and his group.

General CRAMER. Or is delegated by him to the Continental Air Command; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Continental Air Command. All right.

Mr. DURHAM. General, do you have to purchase all of your planes out of this allotment of $115,000,000?

General CRAMER. No, sir. That was why I interjected the statement about equipment being available to us on a nonreimbursable basis.

Mr. DURHAM. That is what I understood. That is why I asked you that question.

Digitized by Google

General CRAMER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. In that connection, do you have any authority to purchase anything that is at all purchased by the procurement set-up in the Air Corps?

General CRAMER. We exercise whatever authority we have through the technical services of the Army through the Air Matériel Command of the Air Force with respect to purchases.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you enter into a contract to purchase this or that type of plane?

General CRAMER. We never have; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you the authority to do so?

General CRAMER. I doubt very much if we have it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of that $115,000,000, what proportion is for pay?

General CRAMER. We can give you that in a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. And also I want to ask you with reference to that, is there enough there so you can keep your men flying enough hours to qualify?

General CRAMER. Mr. Johnson, in that connection there is always a question between what is most desired and what the financial set-up will support.

Now, I am going to have to talk for a moment as an Army officer. I am not an Air Force officer. The Air Force people in the Bureau tell me that in order to maintain the most desirable state of flying proficiency we should support a flying program of approximately 180 hours per year; that is, for combat pilots flying the 47's and the 51's and the 80's, and for nontactical aircraft a lesser time. We have not had sufficient funds to attain the 180 hours, but we have been proceeding under a program calling for 100 to 110 to 125. That is the situation at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Even that is over twice as much—the lower amount—as the ground officer had to take. Forty-eight exercises of an hour apiece is all he has to take.

General RECKORD. Two hours apiece.

General CRAMER. Two hours.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, the first figure is almost twice as much.

General CRAMER. The total amount of training time, Mr. Johnson, on an hourly basis is 96 during the armory-training period and 92 more or less during the field-training period, or 188 hours.

Mr. JOHNSON. The reason I asked my question was that last summer I had some meetings with some Reserve officers and they claimed there wasn't enough money in the till to take care of the pay, and they would pay them on the basis of about half-time training. Have you experienced that yourself with reference to the flyers?

General CRAMER. In the National Guard, Mr. Johnson, we have always been the happy recipient of much service contributed by the average guardsman above the compensation which he received. So we always have that general proposition in the Guard. We hope it will always continue.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, General.

Now, we will take a recess until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. The other witnesses will be heard at that time.

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, we will take very little time. We are sorry we cut our friends from the Reserve—General Evans and his staff—out of time this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the general stays here, does he not?

General RECKORD. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. We will give him a chance and let him talk.

(Whereupon, at 12:12 p. m., the hearing was adjourned.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Wednesday, February 2, 1949.

(The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.)

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

This is a continuation of the hearing on H. R. 1437.

When the committee recessed yesterday we had the benefit of the testimony of Gen. Milton A. Reckord.

I understand this morning General Evans——

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, if you would permit us just a few minutes, the National Guard can then close.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General RECKORD. But we would like just a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir.

General RECKORD. The purpose being to give evidence to the committee to counteract statements which have been made both by the Gray Board report and subsequently from Air Corps Headquarters to the effect that the State lines are disturbing in that they conflict and interfere with the proper operation of Air National Guard.

Now, we have present to testify in opposition to that statement General Boutwell, of Massachusetts, who commands Air National Guard in New England; Colonel Mackall, of the District of Columbia, who commands as well Air National Guard in Maryland and Virginia, and recently a squadron in Delaware was added; and Colonel Gould, of the State of Maryland, who is a squadron commander.

So we would like you just to hear short statements from these three gentlemen, and then we will conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us take up the Reserve——

General RECKORD. Won't you let these three speak for just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. All right, then.

General RECKORD. General Boutwell.

STATEMENT BY BRIG. GEN. LOUIS EVANS BOUTWELL, OF BOSTON, MASS.

General BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, my name is Louis E. Boutwell. I am commanding the Sixty-seventh Wing of the Air National Guard, taking in all of the New England States.

Some 2½ years ago, as we were being organized, this question of State lines became obviously pertinent. We called a conference of all of the adjutants general in New England in Boston, and they all concurred in delegating to me authority to command all those units as far as their training and their tactics is concerned. It was voluntarily granted; and there has never been any trouble or any difficulty in crossing State lines in New England. And I have had the full concurrence of our adjoining wing in New York.

I would like to add this, that a federalization of the National Guard in Massachusetts would destroy the Massachusetts elements. All of them are located on facilities owned by the State or by one of the cities, and all of them are facilities desired by other agencies, and all of them would be lost if we failed to have the local aspects that has maintained our standing in our communities.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

General RECKORD. Colonel Mackall, of the District.

STATEMENT BY COL. LAIDLER B. MACKALL, OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Colonel MACKALL. My name is Laidler B. Mackall. I am an attorney here in Washington and also in command of the District fighter group, which includes units in Maryland, Virginia, and recently Delaware, as well as the District of Columbia.

Long before this Gray Board consideration of State lines came up, the matter was considered in my unit, and the other States voluntarily came forward and gave to me the right to command their units for operational training.

I can only repeat what General Boutwell said. My experience has been similar. There has been no trouble whatsoever as regards commanding these other State units. In fact, they have been very enthusiastic and welcomed any plans or operations we have had. We have run off several operations that have included all of these units. Some of them have been planned by my headquarters and some by headquarters in the other States. I issue direct operational orders to the units under my command, and there has never been any hesitation or question about these orders. This state of affairs is common not only here but throughout the Air National Guard.

General RECKORD. If you will permit Colonel Gould, who is a squadron commander in Maryland, to say a word.

STATEMENT BY COL. ROBERT L. GOULD, OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Colonel GOULD. Gentlemen, my name is Robert L. Gould. I am commanding officer of the One Hundred and Fourth Fighter Squadron in Maryland.

Looking at it from the level of a squadron commander, the lowest unit in command, State lines interpose no objection at all, or no difficulty in operation. As a matter of fact, the Air National Guard units and the States themselves have done everything possible to implement operation across State lines. The only hesitancy has been on the part of the Regular Establishment in crossing lines. We have worked in harmony with the group and the wing under whose command we fall.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

General RECKORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, General Finch of the Bureau is here, and General Fox, who is adjutant general of West Virginia, is here—but with your permission we will hand to the chairman, or to the clerk, suggestions along the line the chairman just made which we were asked to do a day or two ago.

Following the procedure in title I, we have suggested redraft of title II, which will do——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us read that now.

Mr. Short, the committee welcomes you back. We missed you when you were away, but we know you will soon catch up with us.

Give Mr. Short a copy of the bill—that is, the original bill.

Mr. HARPER. He has the original bill before him.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, let us read the amendment.

We are considering title II, Mr. Short, on page 4. We finished with the Army title. Mr. Blandford, read section 201 now. Let us see what amendments there are.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Section 201 as it appears in H. R. 1437 is as follows [reading]:

The United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 Air Force groups and 22 separate Air Force squadrons, supplemented by 61 Air Force Reserve groups, together with necessary supporting and auxiliary units. The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements, including tactical, administrative, logistic, Air Transport, and training, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, you are proposing an amendment to that, are you?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And your amendment is in the sheet that you have just handed out.

Now, let the staff member read the amendment that you are proposing.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, before the staff member reads, please let me say that we have no desire whatever to rewrite this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right. Go ahead.

General RECKORD. In offering these amendments, we want to be helpful.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. Any language the committee determines upon we will accept.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see what you propose.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I understand the general is submitting these amendments at the request of the chairman?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Your proposal is to strike out section 201 as written in the bill and offer this in lieu thereof?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, read section 201 as suggested.

Mr. BLANDFORD. The amendment as suggested in lieu of section 201 is as follows [Reading]:

The organized peace establishment of the Air Force of the United States, including the United States Air Force, the Air National Guard of the United States, and the Air Force Reserve, shall include all of those air units and other air organizations, with their installations, and supporting and auxiliary elements, including combat, training, administrative, and logistic, and all personnel, including those not assigned to units, necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the air national defense in the event of national emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, as I said yesterday, there is always confusion about Army of the United States and the United States Army. Now, we have here—the Air Force of the United States, including the United States Air Force * * *.

Now, can't we begin to write in legislation just one name, without two or three names?

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest you don't attempt that in this bill.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Those terms are specifically defined in the National Defense Act and well understood. There is a legislative definition, not as to the Air Force but as to the Army. This would be only placing in the Air Force the same designations we have had in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General RECKORD. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. It would be in keeping with existing law.

General RECKORD. Yes, Mr. Short.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire if there is any place in the statute an expression creating the United States Air Force.

General RECKORD. Oh, yes, sir; in the Unification Act.

Mr. COLE. Have you studied it rather closely, and could you point out just where?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

This is found in section 207 (c) of Public Law 253—it is found on page 9, if you have a copy.

The term "Department of the Air Force," as used in this act shall be construed to mean the Department of the Air Force at the seat of government and all field headquarters, forces, Reserve components, installations, activities, and functions under the control or supervision of the Department of the Air Force.

(d) There shall be in the Department of the Air Force—well, that refers to the Under Secretary.

The term "United States Air Force" is used in the section as meaning the regular force.

Shall I read that, Mr. Cole?

Mr. COLE. No. I just wanted you to call my attention to where it was.

General RECKORD. If you will follow through on page 9, section 207, you will get the point clear.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Then the committee can understand, when you use the term "the Air Force of the United States" that includes the Regular United States Air Force and the Air National Guard?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir; and the Air Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Air Reserve.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, let me ask you this: In the bill we said that the United States Air Force shall have an authorized strength of 70 Air Force groups.

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I don't see where you put any 70 in this.

General RECKORD. Well. I have followed what the committee approved tentatively in title I. The Army side does this very same thing. And then in the next three sections proposed we come to the strengths.

The CHAIRMAN. You come to the 70 groups?

General RECKORD. We don't mention the 70 groups, but you can have all the groups that Congress will propose or authorize.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I think it is highly important that we have a minimum. I think the committee would like to have it somewhere spelled out that the minimum is 70 air groups. We will put that in.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, we honestly were not attempting to rewrite the bill. We were simply attempting to give a guide.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Before you leave that point that I am trying to have developed, I still am unable to find where in the statute there is any definition of the United States Air Force.

Now, the section to which the general has directed our attention does not define the United States Air Force. It says——

General RECKORD. Mr. Cole, you may be correct on that, sir, because there is an effort being made in the Pentagon now to get up a list of definitions and have it brought up to Congress to have it enacted into law.

Mr. COLE. It would seem to me if in this bill we are going to refer to the United States Air Force there should be either in this bill or in existing statute some definition of what we are talking about.

General RECKORD. Well, Mr. Cole, if you go back to the National Defense Act, section 1, we have this language:

The Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officer Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserve, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

There are no definitions.

Mr. COLE. It says what the United States Army shall consist of. That is a definition in itself.

There is no comparable definition of the United States Air Force on the statute books, comparable with this expression of the Defense Act that you just read.

General RECKORD. Well, you may have a point there.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. COLE. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson of California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think in section 208 the bill goes into that. I don't know whether it goes into that enough in detail, but on page 10 it says:

The United States Air Force is hereby established under the Department of the Air Force. The Army Air Force, the Air Corps, United States Army, and the General Headquarters Air Force (Air Force Combat Command), shall be transferred to the United States Air Force.

It then tells about the Chief of Staff and other details.

Mr. COLE. That still doesn't say——

General RECKORD. I think, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Cole has a good point there.

Digitized by Google

But I do know the matter is being considered in the Pentagon at the present time, with the idea of coming to Congress with a series of definitions.

Mr. KILDAY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. I think the gentleman from New York is correct on that. If we are going to use these terms we ought to paraphrase section 1 of the National Defense Act, relating it to the Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it looks like to me we should put some positive definition as to what constitutes the United States Air Force, and put it right in here.

Mr. SHORT. Because your first section of the National Defense Act tells what the United States Army is.

General RECKFORD. I will be glad to redraft this, if the committee wishes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, our staff will help us on that. I think they understand what we have in mind.

General RECKORD. So it is the sense of the committee at this point that the words "United States Air Force" should have a definite and positive meaning.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what would that meaning be?

General RECKORD. The United States Air Force should——

The CHAIRMAN. Be the Regulars, the National Guard, and the Reserve?

General RECKORD. Should be the Regular Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General RECKORD. The Air Force of the United States, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. Should be the Regular Air Force, the National Guard Air Force, and the Reserve Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. COLE. Then, what should the United States Air Force be?

General RECKORD. The United States Air Force is the Regular Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. Only.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. COLE. Is that in harmony with the definition of the United States Army?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir; exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Then we define that the Air Force of the United States shall include the Regular United States Air Force, the Air National Guard, and the Air Force Reserve.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And then whenever we use the words "United States Air Force," that is the Regular.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we all understand that.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, you should include the Air ROTC in there.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. All right. I think we have it.

Mr. Harlow and Mr. Blandford, you fix up something that will bring that out.

Now, let us read section 202, Mr. Blandford, please, sir.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

SEC. 202. The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized an active-duty strength——

The CHAIRMAN. No; let us read our amendment.

Mr. SHORT. The suggested revisions—

There is hereby authorized * * *.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

(a) There is hereby authorized for the Air Force of the United States an active-duty personnel strength of 502,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, exclusive of such 1-year enlistees as are or have been authorized by law, officer candidates, aviation cadets, and personnel of the Reserve components on active duty for training purposes only, persons paid under the appropriations for the Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve, and personnel and units of the Reserve components ordered to active duty in an emergency hereafter declared.

General RECKORD. That is practically a rewrite of the section pertaining to the Army in title I.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, that is the Regular.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the Regular?

General FINCH. That is not the Regular.

General RECKORD. This is the total, over-all strength for the whole force.

Mr. BLANDFORD. On active duty.

General RECKORD. On active duty.

It is just as you did——

Mr. SHORT. With the exceptions that you have just enumerated.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir, but the total on active duty cannot be more than the figures stated herein.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, let us clear that up. In the Draft Act we put the total strength of the air at 502,000.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That didn't include the National Guard and that didn't include the Reserve. That included what we had in mind the Regular Establishment would be.

From the language you have here, this would include the Reserve and the Guard——

General RECKORD. Ordered to active duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Air Force is the whole thing. That is the umbrella.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the top.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, when you say the Air Force it should embrace three things: The Regular, the Guard, and the Reserve. And when you use the words "The United States Air Force" that means the Regular Establishment. Therefore you have restricted it only to the Regular group when you use that word "Air Force of the United States."

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, if you will go back to section 102 you will see that it is written in like manner. You give the Army of the United States an active-duty personnel strength. This section gives the Air Force——

The CHAIRMAN. General, why do we use the words, in this connection, "The Air Force of the United States?" Why not use the words "The United States Air Force," which would be the Regular, and which would be active duty?

General RECKORD. We did it because in section 102 you used the term "The Army of the United States," which includes the Regular Army and those from the Reserve who are on active duty. This is an authorization for active duty strength.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Blandford.

Mr. BLANDFORD. I was going to paraphrase what General Reckord said. What the figure of 502,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons would include would be those persons on active duty in the Air Force, whether they were Regulars or Reserves.

General RECKORD. That is all.

Mr. BLANDFORD. It would not include people who were on active duty for a 2-week period of training, or would not include 1-year enlistees or officer candidates or aviation cadets. It does not include the figures that you have authorized for the Air National Guard, or will authorize for the Air National Guard; nor does it include the Air Force Reserve. But should those people come on extended periods of active duty during peacetime they would be included in the overall authorization of 502,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. But the Air Force of the United States in the previous paragraph is larger than it is in this paragraph because it embraces the Guard, the Regular, and the Reserve. Then you come down to the next section and say:

There is hereby authorized for the Air Force of the United States an active duty * * *.

My point is, why shouldn't it be:

There is hereby authorized for the United States Air Force an active-duty personnel strength of 502,000 * * *.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, if you did that then you would not have any authority for bringing any Reserve officers or enlisted personnel into active service.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Of course you would. There is no restriction on that because it is made up of it now. The 502,000 is made up of Reservists who are called to active duty.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I had the same confusion, but if you read the last sentence of this section I think it will clear up your mind because it is exclusive of.

Now, you could have your total of 502,000 full authorized strength on duty, consisting of maybe all your enlisted men as Regulars so you would be up to your full authorized strength. The Guard can only be called in the event of an emergency, and the last sentence here says this figure of 502,000 is exclusive of personnel and units of the Reserve components ordered to active duty in an emergency hereafter declared. . .

Digitized by Google

Mr. SHORT. But in normal peacetime 502,000 is the maximum, whether they are from the Regular, the National Guard, or Reserve.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir; the maximum that can be ordered to active duty.

The CHAIRMAN. But that doesn't constitute all of the Air Force of the United States. That is my point.

General RECKORD. No, sir; it doesn't.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General RECKORD. If you will read the following sections you will get that.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, let us see.

General RECKORD. This is in line, Mr. Chairman, with what was done in title I.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Go ahead, Mr. Blandford.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

(b) Of the active-duty personnel strength authorized in subsection (a) of this section, not to exceed 35,000 may be Regular Air Force officers, and 4,800 may be Regular Air Force warrant officers.

General RECKORD. That was taken from the language of the section in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right, section 202. Now, (c)——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. COLE. If we are in this bill to define the United States Air Force, which will mean the Regulars, shouldn't we then say this, that this 35,000 may be United States Air Force officers?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. And leave the word "Regular" out?

General RECKORD. That is right. But you remember yesterday, or Friday, I believe, you added the word "Regular" as you were going over these sections.

Mr. SHORT. It is superfluous if we understand the United States Air Force.

Mr. KILDAY. I think we ought to keep it uniform.

Mr. TOWE. So do I.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, (c).

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

(c) There is hereby authorized for the Air National Guard of the United States a personnel strength to be distributed among the several States, Territories, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia, of ——— officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, including those serving on active duty in the Air Force of the United States who are not counted within the personnel strength of 502,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, may I point there to the fact that we have left the number blank?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. We have in the guard today 27 groups. We have a certain strength. We expect, if Congress appropriates the money, to go a little higher. But our thought is—and we advance it for the consideration of the committee—that in this section which applies to the guard, and in the following section which applies to the Reserve, you make that authorization as you are doing for the Army and the

Digitized by Google

Regular Air Force a little higher so that in case of emergency we can move up in our strength without coming back——

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General RECKORD. To the Congress, and that you treat the Reserve and the Guard equally in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, don't we put in here something about groups?

General RECKORD. If that is the will of the committee, that is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Why don't you put it in this way: Twenty-seven groups, and then put the officers, warrant officers, and——

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, may I indicate why we think that is not a good thing to do.

Let me take the chairman's own State. Suppose we would find there is another city in the State of Georgia that desires a squadron, or two squadrons. A group doesn't mean anything. A group may have two squadrons in it, or four. We think it would be much better if you gave us an over-all ceiling beyond which we could not go. There might be 27 groups. There might be 30, if the Air Corps decided that it was good business to have 30, and Congress approved.

The CHAIRMAN. Well——

General RECKORD. But groups, wings, and divisions have no definite strength.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, the General has been advocating bringing the Air Force provision in line with the Army provision.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And we did exactly that in the Army. We fixed personnel ceilings and organizations.

General RECKORD. You took the specific statement as to units and organizations out of the Army bill——

Mr. KILDAY. No.

General RECKORD. Didn't you?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes, we took the regiments and the divisions and all that out of the Army bill.

General RECKORD. You took it out of the Army side and gave them an over-all strength. Our own opinion, Mr. Chairman, is that it ought to be figured on perhaps 35 for the Guard and 35 for the Air.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean groups?

General RECKORD. The strength that would give us that many groups.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Then, why wouldn't we be on safe ground—that would probably take care of all of the requests from the 33 members, if you put there 35 groups——

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, we weren't figuring it on that basis.

The CHAIRMAN. We would all be on safe ground.

General RECKORD. But, seriously, Mr. Chairman, there should be a ceiling beyond which we cannot go.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. But will give us a little bit of cushion.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the committee will decide what the ceiling should be.

Digitized by Google

General RECKORD. Well, I suggest the round figure of 100,000 for the Guard and 100,000 for the Reserve, beyond which we could not go.

The CHAIRMAN. And you wouldn't have to come back here.

General RECKORD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the benefit of that.

General RECKORD. Pardon?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the benefit of putting it at 100,000.

General RECKORD. We think so; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if we wrote in the bill a ceiling of not more than 35 groups, and not more than 100,000 officers and enlisted personnel——

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be laying down a program which would not have to be reconsidered and studied by the Congress in case of national emergency.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir. Now, please understand I am not trying to write the Reserve section. General Evans is here. I am trying to get in the record that we think both components should be treated alike.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. I am trying to fix it so if any States want to expand they can do so, if Congress makes the money available.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire what ratio this figure of 100,000 which you recommend bears to the 500,000 of the Air Force active-duty strength—how that compares with the ratio between the Regular Army strength and the National Guard authorized strength?

Mr. RECKORD. Mr. Cole, I don't believe I am qualified to answer it; but, if you wish, we will try to give you that information.

I just picked that number out of the air. It could be a little bit less, if you wish. We are not expecting or anticipating reaching that number. We expect a National Air Guard of 58,000 by 1950.

Mr. COLE. What is it now?

General RECKORD. Thirty-six some hundred.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, members of the committee, tentatively, if there is no objection, let us agree in our minds—of course, it is all subject to reconsideration after we hear from the Department—not exceeding 35 groups and 100,000 men. I think we will be on safe ground to reach a figure along that line.

The staff please bear that in mind.

All right, now, take your section (d).

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

(d) There is hereby authorized for the Air Force——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait. This is for the Reserve?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You finished as far as the Guard is concerned?

General RECKORD. Yes, sir; we finished. And we want to thank you, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, for your consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to thank you, General, for the aid and assistance your organization has rendered in reaching a proper decision.

General RECKORD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. And I want to compliment you and your organization on the magnificent National Air Guard that you have established. I want those figures used in the debate, to show what has been accomplished by the Air National Guard.

I was much gratified to hear the testimony that a large number of these planes that participated in the inauguration were Air National Guard. I didn't know it. I thought all that was the very cream of the Regulars. I thought, when all of them were flying by, that that was a very top aces in the service. But I am glad to know they came from 25 States and made such a wonderful showing.

General RECKORD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You are to be congratulated.

General RECKORD. We have some charts here. Will they be needed?

The CHAIRMAN. We are finished with the Guard, now.

We will go to General Evans, and the Reserve.

General RECKORD. Again I want to thank the chairman and the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, we might want those charts in the debate on the floor. Just leave those charts with the committee.

Now, General Evans, the committee will be pleased to hear from you as representing the Reserve. We will be glad for you to make any statement you desire.

Is your statement prepared?

General EVANS. Yes, sir.

If I may introduce myself, I am Brigadier General E. A. Evans, O. R. C., executive director of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States.

STATEMENT BY BRIG. GEN. E. A. EVANS, O. R. C., EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION OF UNITED STATES

General EVANS. The Reserve Officers Association is a voluntary organization composed of Reserve officers of the three services, Army, Navy, and Air Force.

The object of our association, as stated in our national constitution, is as follows:

> The object of the association shall be to support a military policy for the United States that will provide adequate national security and to assist in the development and execution theerof.

Through the courtesy of the chairman and the members of this committee, I appear here today for the purpose of giving the views of our association on the subject of H. R. 1437, now under consideration by this committee, and to comment further on the subject of the Organized Reserve Corps in the Army and Air Force.

The Reserve Officers Association has no comments on title I of this bill as it has been amended. This title gives to the Organized Reserve Corps of the Army an over-all strength of 980,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men. This strength is greater than that which we have now or could be attained except by the wholehearted cooperation of the Regular Army. Section 102 (d) provides warrant officers in the Reserve, which is something that has been needed for some time.

Title II of the bill has to do with the Air Force of the United States and the United States Air Force. I listened with interest to the presentation made by the National Guard yesterday and today. We agree that the use of the words "United States Air Force" and "Air Force of the United States," as used in sections 201 and 202, do not convey the apparent intent contained in those paragraphs, and we furthermore agree that, for the sake of clarification and proper understanding, this section should be redrafted. Inasmuch as title I has created warrant officers for the Reserves, it seems only logical that title II likewise should provide for Reserve Air Force warrant officers, and we so recommend.

In reference to title III, we are disturbed about section 301 and strongly recommend that this entire section be deleted from the bill. It seems to us that the title of this section should have been "Blank Check" rather than "Saving Provision," because if written into law the Congress of the United States, in effect, would be saying to one portion of the executive branch of our Government, "If you don't like what we have written in this law, then change it to suit yourself." We can find no good reason, nor excuse, why such a provision as outlined in section 301 is necessary, and, furthermore, consider it a most dangerous, as well as a most unusual precedent.

We are forced to take issue with our good friends of the National Guard as to the advisability of awaiting the outcome of the Secretary of Army's committee, headed up by Mr. Byrnes, and the Secretary of Air's committee, headed up by General Quesada. Such committees many times become involved in lengthy discussions. Furthermore, they are advisory only to the respective Secretaries; and, quite frankly, if the chairman and members of the House Armed Services Committee feel the necessity of reviewing the Reserve and National Guard situation in detail, we of the Reserves most sincerely urge that such review and study be made by a subcommittee of this, the House Armed Services Committee, as suggested by the chairman during yesterday's session. Such a subcommittee, looking into the situation which prevails in the civilian components, should be most salutary in effect and should provide this committee with information upon which not only to draft the necessary legislation but also to provide the committee with valuable information to guide its operations in connection with other much-needed legislation affecting both the National Guard and the Organized Reserve Corps. The Reserve Officers Association indeed would welcome an opportunity to appear before such subcommittee, for we feel that it is to you gentlemen that we must look for an adequate and proper Reserve program and for national security for our country.

The chairman, at the last session of this committee, indicated that he would like to have an outline of the situation which exists presently in the Army and Air Force Reserve. To outline these Reserve programs, it is necessary for me to give you a little background on the Reserve planning which has taken place since 1944, as well as to give you certain figures in connection with the intake of officers and enlisted men into the Army and Air Force Reserves following World War II.

Section 5 of the National Defense Act created a general staff committee, made up of an equal number of Regular Army, National Guard, and Reserve officers, charged with the function of making recommendations on policies affecting the National Guard and the Reserve. During the war years of World War II, the section 5 committee was eliminated under the War Powers Act, but in the fall of 1944 it was recreated. The committee was charged with the function of preparing plans for the postwar civilian components. I was one of the Reserve members of that committee. The plans for the postwar National Guard and the Organized Reserves as finally outlined by this committee were approved by General Marshall, as Chief of Staff, and Secretary of War Stimson. The thoughts in the minds of the committee members, in particular regard to the Organized Reserve Corps itself, were influenced by the fact that twice in our lifetime, this country has been a major participant in a World War. Both times we were woefully unprepared. It was felt that the very life of this Nation might depend on the adequacy of our civilian components, the National Guard and the Organized Reserve Corps. We all knew that sooner or later the size of the Regular forces might be reduced in size far below a safety point.

With these thoughts in mind, we had discarded the idea of the Organized Reserve Corps, having an officer corps only which existed between the two World Wars. Units in the Reserve were conceived of three different types, one, those which were to be fully organized with a full strength of officers and enlisted men, adequately equipped and trained and ready for service; these units to be comparable to National Guard units. A second type was to be partially organized, having a full complement of officers and a cadre of enlisted men and with partial equipment. The third type of unit was to be composed of officers only. All were to be adequately trained.

The entire Reserve program therefore was just as simple as that. All that remained to be done was to obtain the officers and the enlisted men, organize them into units, give them equipment and facilities, and the program would be on its way.

The officers and the men for the Organized Reserve Corps were obtained at the separation centers. In the Army, 285,000 officers and 460,000 enlisted men joined the Army Reserve and in the Air Force, 233,000 officers and 187,000 men joined the Air Force Reserve. The officers, in accordance with the provisions in the National Defense Act, were commissioned for a 5-year period and the enlisted men were enlisted for 3 years. No more wonderful opportunity possibly could have been given to any general staff. There were over a million officers and men who had joined the Organized Reserve of this country who felt that it was essential for the security of this Nation that we have an adequate Reserve Corps. The officers were there, the enlisted men in existence, but all of a sudden things started to happen, or more aptly stated, I should say, failed to happen. Units were not organized, and I shall certainly not take the time of this committee at this time to go into all of the details of why units were not organized. But the fact remains that they were not. One year, and 2 years, and 3 years went by and still units were not organized. The inevitable result took place. Officers who had expected to be assigned to organized units became disgusted and lost interest. As far as the men are concerned, their enlistments started running out last year. Having heard nothing, not having been assigned to any unit at the time when their interest was high, few have reenlisted, as you can imagine. The results, as far as the enlisted men are concerned, are obviously worse than that of the officers. It is indeed a sad commentary on the hopes of those of us who conceived the postwar Reserve program. It has been a source of keen disappointment that we have not been able to achieve that which we still feel is of vital necessity for the eventual security of this Nation, and that is an adequate Reserve program. The opportunity was there. It was handed to the General Staff but they failed to grasp an opportunity which may never again be presented to this Nation.

One explanation or excuse often given for the delay or ineffectiveness of the reserve program is "lack of funds."

Mr. SHORT. We had plenty of material, General.

General EVANS. I would like to comment on that later, Mr. Short.

Let us examine the situation to determine whether "lack of funds" is a cause or an effect. In that connection, may I quote from Report No. 2135 Eightieth Congress, second session, "National Military Establishment, military functions appropriation bill, 1949, page 16.

ORGANIZED RESERVES.—The total budget request for this activity is $125,000,000, from which the committee recommends a reduction of $25,000,000. The committee was not impressed with the presentation of the needs for the funds requested or with the manner in which this program is apparently being conducted. Too many men are encouraged to enlist in the Reserves and then hearing nothing further from such enlistment. The committee was informed that a total of 518,069 officers and 644,590 enlisted men had joined the Reserve ranks and are willing to devote their time and energy toward developing a balanced national defense force, but of these numbers only a small number of units have been given assignments; they are as follows:

(a) Organized units:

Ground Force units: Officers, as of March 22, 1948, 49,524; enlisted, as of March 22, 1948, 34,731;

Air Force units: Officers, as of December 31, 1947, 16,439; enlisted, as of December 31, 1947, 2,137.

(b) Composite units:

Ground Force units: Officers, as of March 22, 1948, 167,059; enlisted, as of March 22, 1948, 90,717.

Air Force units: Officers, as of December 31, 1947, 1,524; enlisted, as of December 31, 1947, 299.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire what is the difference between organized and composite units?

General EVANS. I have in mind discussing that a little later, if I may, Mr. Cole.

I am still quoting:

The committee is in deep sympathy with the purposes of the Organized Reserves and sincerely trusts that during the coming fiscal year and with the expenditure of the funds here recommended and made available, it will be possible for this organization to provide some organized activity and training for the men who are willing to devote their time and energy to national defense activities. The Congress, through the enactment of Public Law 460, has attempted to encourage this activity through granting inactive-duty pay to officers and men who are members and active in this organization.

The situation became so intolerable that it became necessary for the President of the United States, on October 15, 1948, to issue an Executive order to the Secretary of Defense, which stated in part as follows:

The Secretary of Defense, and the head of each Department in the National Military Establishment, shall proceed without delay utilizing every practicable resource of the Regular components of the Armed Forces, to organize all Reserve component units, and to train such additional individuals now or hereafter members of the active Reserve, as may be required for the national security; and to establish vigorous and progressive programs of appropriate instruction and training for all elements of the Reserve components, including the National Guard.

Digitized by Google

For the President of the United States to be placed in the position where it was necessary for him to issue such an Executive order was bad enough, but for the Departments of the Army and Air Force to attempt at this late date to pick up the programs and make something of them was, and is, indeed a colossal task. In the letter to the Secretary of Defense accompanying the Executive order, the President suggested that assignment of an active, capable high-ranking officer to head the Reserve program in both the Departments of the Army and Air. These assignments have been made, Lieut. Gen. E. R. Quesada has been placed in charge of the program for the Air and Maj. Gen. Charles W. Ryder has been placed in charge on the Army side. I have talked with both of these gentlemen and find that they are realizing what a terrific task has been placed upon their shoulders. They came into the matter cold, knowing nothing of the program, practically nothing about the Reserves. Perhaps this is good, because neither of them can have any preconceived ideas of what is or has been the difficulty but are able to see the program as it now exists and can work forward to one objective, and that is to carry out the provisions of the President's Executive order in seeing that units are effectually organized, equipped, and trained.

I find both of these gentlemen earnest, sincere, and capable, and I have no doubt but that they will bend every possible effort in an attempt to bring order out of chaos.

We were very much interested in a question asked the other day by Mr. Anderson of California. The question was asked of General Bradley and was to the effect "What is the reason for the present inadequacy of the Army Reserve?" General Bradley's answer generally covered five points:

1. Lack of funds.
2. Difficulty in obtaining sufficient instructors;
3. Lack of training facilities;
4. Lack of equipment;
5. Situations where officers of all grades and stages of experience were grouped together for training and where they were so grouped instruction was very difficult.

We agree with all of these points but there might well have been added a sixth point, which to members of the Army Reserve—and I might say parenthetically also to the Air Force Reserve—is of far more importance and probably hits at the root of the past and present condition more directly than any of the points enumerated by General Bradley. The point to which I refer is the necessity of bringing about the completion of properly organized Reserve units.

For over 3 years we have been stressing the necessity of organizing adequate, practical, and sensible units of the Army Reserve. It is a well-known fact and comes from 20 years' experience with the Organized Reserve Corps of the Army, that the civilian officer must have a military home if he is to maintain and retain his interest in the Reserves. His military home, the unit to which he is assigned, must be one that is based wherever possible on a table of organization. The officer must be made to feel that he is a part of a unit that is of some value to the security program. This is a very simple basic starting solution to this entire problem, but perhaps this is the reason why it has been so difficult to put over—it sounded too easy. This is the one thing that we have been quarreling about for all this period of time—ever since the close of the fighting war. Once an officer is in such a unit and a commanding officer has been assigned, unit morale can and is created, a training program is possible, and, furthermore, is created by the Reserve officers themselves.

In talking about the inadequacies of the Reserve in the past few years, it is our opinion that the principal reason for the failure to have a good Army Reserve at the present time—and I can say parenthetically it applies equally as well to the Air Force—is because officers and men have not been given mobilization assignments and because they have not been assigned to practical Reserve units.

I would like to leave the past. Let us look at the future. The Department of the Army took a step last November to decentralize to the armies the creation of training units. In fact, they said that all of the composite groups which had existed in the past would be eliminated and that the commanding generals of the various armies could and would create Reserve training units of any number in any place and of any size up to corps headquarters. This directive is a move in the right direction. I am very happy to see that the program is now on its way. We are assuming, of course, that the creation of training units is only a prelude to the eventual creation of units, as originally recommended by the section 5 committee.

I am of course referring to table of organization units.

In the case of the Air Force Reserve program, I regret to state that the same impetus has not been placed on a start of a program as is the case with the Army. The Army has slowly started to move, but unfortunately I cannot say this of the Air. I do know that under the capable guidance of General Quesada, a program for the Air Force Reserves is being planned. From what I have been able to learn of the program, it appears to be good as far as it goes. This program affects only about 60-odd thousand officers and a relatively small proportion of enlisted men. We are assured by General Quesada's office that the plans for the Volunteer Reserves—may I interject here; I am referring now to the difference between the 60-odd thousand that would be in the Organized Reserve and the balance of 234,000, which is their total strength, so that somewhere around 180,000, we will say, would be in the Volunteer Reserve, and referring to that Volunteer Reserve—are being considered at the present time and it will not be too long until these plans are ready for distribution.

We previously understood that the plans for this Volunteer Air Reserve group were such that these Reserve officers would be given no opportunity for promotion, for credits that would allow them to remain in the service, nor would they be given the opportunity to gain credits for qualifying them under Public Law 810, the Reserve retirement law. I am now informed that this has been changed and that an opportunity will be given to the Volunteer Air Reserve not only for promotion, but for retention and qualifications for retirement. This is good because otherwise we would have lost forever this large number of Air Reservists who served in World War II and who could not have been assigned to the Air Force Organized Reserve because of limitations of numbers.

Quite frankly, I hesitate to comment too forcibly upon the present situation in the field. The President of the United States is determined to see that an adequate Reserve program is created, and I have every faith in the interest of General Quesada and General Ryder in trying to see that the President's wishes are carried out. I would not wish to say anything about the present plans for the Reserve program which would embarrass them or hold them back from bringing about a speedy accomplishment of their mission. Quite to the contrary, they will find the Reserve officers association their strongest booster, until such time as we can see a repetition of past failures again facing us.

We are in this security program all together—the Reserves, the National Guard, and the Regular services. We would like to feel we could all work together amicably and to the same end, but unfortunately we oftentimes are in the position of realizing that in the Regular service there are individuals, and sometimes in high places, who are not entirely sold on the idea that the Organized Reserve Corps should be anything else than, to quote Representative Bob Sikes of Florida, "cannon fodder and filler replacements." If we felt that by just being "cannon fodder" and that by just being "filler replacements" this would accomplish the end which we seek, namely, adequate national security, then I feel sure that we would gladly keep to the background and let this course of thinking prevail. The fact remains, however, that we honestly and sincerely do not believe that is the best way in which we can serve our country. True, our vocation is first, our way of life, as a civilian; but our avocation, because we feel it is essential to the security of the country, is that of a military man.

Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, I cannot tell you how strongly we rely upon the Armed Services Committee for help and guidance in our attempt to bring about a proper and adequate Organized Reserve Corps program for the Army and Air Forces so that we in turn can be assured of an adequate national security for this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. Short, any questions to the General on this general subject?

Mr. SHORT. I think he has given us a very clear and very forceful statement. It is most regretable, almost tragic, that we have already lost many of our best Reserve officers and enlisted men. I hope we are not too late to correct failures and abuses of the past.

General EVANS. I hope so.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. General, specifically with reference to title II of the bill, has your association recommended, with the suggested changes that the chairman has stated we would bear in mind as to over-all policy, leaving the wording for a later time?

General EVANS. I think generally so, Mr. Kilday.

Of course, I would like to see the way that title II is drafted before I comment on the thing.

Mr. KILDAY. I understand. But I mean such things as the divisions of 35 groups to the Air Guard, 35 to the Air Reserve, and 100,000 men to each; would that meet with your approval?

General EVANS. We have always held to the principle that there should be parity wherever possible between the National Guard and the Reserve.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SHORT. So you would agree to the subsection (d) under section 202, and section 203: The authorized aircraft strength, on page 2 of the suggested amendments?

General EVANS. That is approximately 100,000?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

General EVANS. I have no objection to that.

It comes somewhat as a shock, quite frankly, to realize that the National Guard is asking for an increase in their strength. I hadn't anticipated that. We are somewhat in the position of being beggars and cannot be choosers on this thing. We haven't much of an Air Reserve program now.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course——

General EVANS. The only thing that disturbs me about the 100,000, quite frankly, is this: We have in the Air Reserve today a very good sizable force, and I am hoping that we can recover the interest of those men. If it is limited to 100,000 I am fearful that we will be forced to throw them out. That is my first reaction to this thing.

Mr. TOWE. How many do you have now that you think would participate, General?

General EVANS. I can't answer that question. I wish I could, Mr. Towe.

We have on paper some 234,000 officers and 187,000 men. This is a sizable force. Now, what percentage can be brought back into being I don't know.

I might say, incidentally, that the passage of Public Law 810, which you gentlemen very kindly reported on favorably last year, is having its effect most definitely on the Reserves. It is having the effect of making Reserve officers and enlisted men become interested in this Reserve program.

Mr. TOWE. They have nothing to be interested in at this point, do they?

General EVANS. That is the trouble. They are interested and want to do something, but they are being forced up against a blank wall.

Mr. SHORT. Your organization is merely on paper?

General EVANS. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, under those figures, a ceiling of 100,000 would automatically cut the potential—the pool—by about 250,000?

General EVANS. Yes; it would. Now, what the actual cut would be I have no way of knowing because I don't know how many of that have lost interest completely and can never be recovered. That is the only thing I am fearful of in connection with a ceiling of that sort. We actually have a potential right now which is greater than 100,000.

Mr. KILDAY. We are going to have to look that over and see what figures General McConnell has.

General EVANS. That is right.

And don't forget, Mr. Kilday, these gentlemen—these officers and these men—are all combat trained. They are not people that have just recently graduated from school. They are people who have had actual experience—and war experience—and to throw them aside and waste them in being seems criminal to me.

Mr. KILDAY. One other matter, General, as to the definition of the Air Force of the United States. You agree in substance with what we have been speaking of here.

General EVANS. Yes; I do.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. You parallel it with the Army of the United States.

General EVANS. I do; indeed.

Mr. KILDAY. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Will you tell us the difference between the composite unit and the organized unit?

General EVANS. Yes. The composite group was a makeshift. Because it would seem to be impossible for the Department of the Army and the Department of the Air Force to get units organized under a T. O. basis they created the composite group, which was an easy way out. It was a matter of taking any community and saying that any group of officers, whether they were Judge Advocate or Adjutant General or infantry or cavalry or quartermaster, or anything else, would be assigned to a composite group. Now, this group was given a commanding officer. Of course, it had no table of organization. You can't imagine a heterogeneous group of officers being put into any organization of that type. But it was a pool. It was simply a method of organizing in some manner, in a pool.

Now, that was the thing General Bradley was referring to in his fifth statement as one of the reasons why the Reserves had not advanced. He said that because they had officers who, some of them, had had front-line combat service and some were colonels and second lieutenants, and being from different branches of service, it was difficult to train them. Of course it was. It was impossible to train them.

We yelled and screamed to high heaven about these composite groups. We passed resolutions in our national convention demanding that they be done away with. We had to use rather strong terms, and I therefore say "demanding" advisedly. But as a result of our protesting they are changing it, and in their place have come training units. They haven't been entirely done away with. You can't do away with them entirely. I know that. I know there are certain localities where it is impossible, and always has been impossible, to have table of organization units, or perhaps even training units. But we certainly must keep them at a minimum because it is the lowest form of animal life, as far as the Reserve program is concerned, in my opinion, and that is the composite group.

Mr. COLE. When you use the expression "Organized Reserve Corps," the word "Organized" is capitalized. Does that have any peculiar meaning or significance that makes it in contrast to the expression "organized reserve corps," with the small letter "o"?

General EVANS. Well, I rather imagine so, Mr. Cole, certainly if we can go back to a statement of General Marshall. General Marshall came out with a very fine piece of work in 1944. Our good friend General Palmer, sitting back of me a short time ago, had a great deal to do, I am sure, with that particular circular. It was probably the first time in the history of this Nation that we had such a clear, concise statement of policy as far as the Military Establishment was concerned as it affected the Regulars and the civilian components or the Reserve components.

Mr. COLE. General, the expression "Organized Reserve Corps," with a capital "O," does not indicate a particular type of Reserve organization, does it?

General EVANS. No. I beg your pardon.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COLE. That is all I have in mind.

General EVANS. No; it does not. I was referring to the over-all set-up of the Reserve itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions, Mr. Cole?

Mr. COLE. Yes; there are a couple more.

General Evans, it seems to me in determining the size of the Reserve, outside of the cost factor, there are two things that we can do: First, be guided by what our Reserve strength should be to give us reasonably adequate national security, or we can have a reserve force of every citizen in the country that is interested and wants to participate. Now, which should it be?

General EVANS. I think the latter. Our concept of the Reserve——

Mr. COLE. Just the latter. You don't want to recommend a ceiling of 100,000?

General EVANS. No; not certainly as far as the air is concerned.

Mr. COLE. Or either one.

General EVANS. Well, for practical reasons I can't quarrel with the nine-hundred-odd-thousand for the Army because it is so far above anything that we have at the present time that we will probably never even approach it.

Maybe it is a mistake to limit the Reserve in that sense. Our concept of the Reserve itself has been that there was no reason other than budgetary limitations why you had to limit. Let us have it as large as we possibly can have it. We had an excellent opportunity, with 1,200,000 bodies, to create that many—that is, right after the war.

Certainly, going back to the thinking in the section 5 committee, there was no top limit that was ever thought of, as far as the Reserves were concerned. It was what you could have. It is what you could create.

Mr. COLE. What you could afford.

General EVANS. Yes; and what you could afford.

You could build up your ROTC. You would get a certain number of youngsters into the Reserve. Whatever that amounted to would eventually mean the size of your Reserve.

Mr. COLE. Then, your recommendation is based on what the country could afford, so far as the size of our Reserve, and not what the country needs for national security?

General EVANS. Yes. Of course it has a definite bearing. You have to keep in mind that your country may need the Reserve or will not need the Reserve.

Now, if you go on the hypothesis that it does not need a Reserve—and certainly that is our feeling about the matter—then we ought to do everything we can to get that Reserve as large as possible because when all is said and done that is the cheapest form of security that you can possibly obtain.

Mr. COLE. Just one other question, Mr. Chairman.

General, is there any statutory limitation on the authority of the President in his determination of what units he shall call into active service in case of emergency?

General EVANS. No.

Mr. COLE. Is he required to call the National Guard first and then the Reserve, or Reserve first and then the National Guard? Or are his hands free, as Commander in Chief, to call anybody he wants to?

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. I don't know that answer, quite frankly. Maybe General Reckord can answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the law——

General RECKORD. The National Defense Act, Mr. Cole, in section 111, provides that when Congress shall declare an emergency and authorize the President, he may order any and all units and organizations and individuals of the National Guard into the active service.

There is a provision in the Draft Act which says that the National Guard shall be used first, next after the Regular Establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. We agreed with our friends of the Reserve, in the present Draft Act, to modify that statement of policy to include those A units of the Reserve necessary to the support of the Regular Army and the National Guard. They are all supposed to go in on a par.

Mr. COLE. Does that mean you are going to suggest new legislation to put that in as policy?

General RECKORD. No, sir. It is in the policy.

Mr. COLE. And it is not going to expire with the termination of the draft law?

General RECKORD. That section would expire with the present law. But that is the law at the present time.

Mr. SHORT. Don't you think it would be wise to make it permanent?

General RECKORD. I do; yes, Mr. Short.

The CHAIRMAN. But, as a matter of fact, it is always understood in case of national emergency, after the Regulars have been called, the next thing to be called is the National Guard.

General RECKORD. That has been our position for years.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly. And for that very reason the Air Force has concentrated on building up a stronger Air National Guard than a Reserve, because it is always understood that the first civilian component to come in is always the National Guard.

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet may I correct one thought which my suggestion of 100,000 strength for the National Guard gave General Evans. We are not asking for any increase in the National Guard. We will be satisfied with that overall ceiling named by the committee, at 100,000. We would rather see it there, so we wouldn't have to come back.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General RECKORD. You can make it 75,000 and you can make the Reserve 250,000. We will be satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Give them as many as those who have indicated their desire to become a member of the Reserve.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions, Mr. Cole?

Mr. COLE. That is all, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Durham, of North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. General Evans, you seem to be pretty well satisfied with the program since the President issued his Executive order. Now, on what basis was the budget fixed for the Reserve section this year?

General EVANS. I can only state in rather general terms, because, of course, I do not know the interworkings over at the Pentagon in reference to the budget figure.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. Were you called in?

General EVANS. No, no.

Mr. DURHAM. For your recommendation or any suggestions?

General EVANS. No; we were not called in on that.

Mr. DURHAM. You weren't consulted at all?

General EVANS. No; not at all.

Mr. DURHAM. What was the final figure recommended in the budget this year?

General EVANS. There are two figures; one for Army and one for Air. If I recall correctly, the Army figure is $125,000,000, and I think the Air figure is close to $80,000,000.

Mr. KILDAY. $115,000,000 was the estimate yesterday?

General EVANS. $115,000,000 for the Army.

Mr. KILDAY. That is what General Cramer testified for the Army yesterday.

General RECKORD. No. That was the figure for the Air National Guard.

Mr. KILDAY. That is what I mean.

General EVANS. I think the Air Reserve is something like $80,000,000.

Mr. DURHAM. That is for your Reserve section?

General EVANS. That is right.

Mr. DURHAM. You could use that much, provided it is all given to you?

General EVANS. Oh, yes. We can use anything that can be given to us, because we are woefully in need of everything.

Mr. DURHAM. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there anything in the Reserve organization that compares with the National Guard Bureau?

General EVANS. Well, yes, Mr. Johnson. It is not the same, but it does compare. It is the closest thing that we have. The National Guard has a Bureau. In the Reserve——

Mr. JOHNSON. That is authorized by law?

General EVANS. That is authorized in the National Defense Act.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any statutory authorization for your activities?

General EVANS. No, there is not. There is no authority for the executive for Reserve and ROTC Affairs Office. That exists. It is headed up at the present time by a brigadier general of the Reserve, and he has a staff.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well——

General EVANS. But he is supposedly only advisory to the Chief of Staff. He has no operating functions whatsoever. It is not a bureau like the National Guard is.

Mr. JOHNSON. He doesn't hold office for a term, like the head man in the National Guard Bureau, does he?

General EVANS. Well, I don't know exactly how the National Guard hold their office; but this officer at the present time is ordered to active duty, and he can be relieved at any time by the Chief of Staff.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, would it be of any advantage to have statutory authorization set up for the Reserve features of the defense system?

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. I think it is very esesntial that that be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, for instance, is that man here today to give us some figures and data, like we had before from the National Guard officer?

General EVANS. No, General Westover is not here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, did he know about the meeting here?

General EVANS. I can't answer that question. Normally, he is not called upon to testify before your committee, and quite regretfully so. I think General Westover has information that is of vital interest to people.

The CHAIRMAN. We will call him up before we are through with the bill. Who is he? General——

General EVANS. General Westover—W-e-s-t-o-v-e-r.

The CHAIRMAN (addressing staff). Invite him here tomorrow morning.

Mr. JOHNSON. Tell us a little bit about his specific duties. You must know something about them.

General EVANS. Yes, I do, Mr. Johnson. He is a staff officer of the Chief of Staff. He is charged with being the principal adviser to the Chief of Staff on Reserve matters.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, does he help prepare the budget?

General EVANS. That is only on the Army side.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. Does he prepare the budget, for instance?

General EVANS. He does not help prepare the budget. He is asked about the budget, and he is allowed to appear and either argue for or against items. But he has no hand in the actual preparation of the budget.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, the National Guard officer prepares the budget and submits it.

General EVANS. They have much more to do with the preparation of the budget than is the case with us.

Mr. JOHNSON. We went through the same thing after the other war, didn't we?

General EVANS. Of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish you would outline what you think ought to be done by the Congress to make this thing click.

Mr. TOWE. He suggested we ought to have a committee appointed and I agree with him.

General EVANS. No. 1, I think it is probably more proper to take up the details with that committee.

I might outline several things that might be of interest to the overall committee, however. We have gone through this thing now for 3 years and we have some pretty definite ideas. We are very much interested in the creation of a bureau for the Reserve, similar to the Bureau that exists for the National Guard. I think that is quite essential.

We have no guarantee that the executive for Reserve Affairs Office is going to continue more than today. It can be eliminated by administrative order tomorrow. There is no standing in law whatsoever.

No. 2, we feel very keenly that we need representation on a Secretary level. Several bills have already been introduced into this Congress, as I understand it, that would create an Assistant Secretary for Army, Navy, and Air, and those assistant secretaries charged with looking out for the Reserve components of that particular department.

Digitized by Google

There are many administrative things that should be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. One other thing—if I am not taking too much time.

The CHAIRMAN. Take all the time you want.

Mr. JOHNSON. We passed this pay bill.

General EVANS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Which we thought would stimulate enlistments by the Reserves.

General EVANS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. How has that worked out, to your personal knowledge?

General EVANS. Well, unfortunately this particular year.

I again go back to the fact that units were not organized. You cannot pay people just for being in the Reserves. They must be in a unit and they must obtain training. That is why you pay them.

Now, what was the result? The Department had a long, long time to prepare the regulations for this thing, but they did not do it. As a result there wasn't a single dollar paid out in the first quarter of this fiscal year, and very, very little money has been paid out in the second quarter of the year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, it was brought to my attention when I was out home this fall that some of these Reserve officers who are doing work on active duty—not active duty but doing part-time work—are not getting paid for all of the exercises that they are allowed to take during the year. Now, why is that?

General EVANS. I have no doubt but that that is correct. Mr. Johnson, because there was a limited sum that was appropriated for the Army and the Air. Now, anticipating that they would not have enough to go around to all of the units which they hoped to organize, it was allotted. And then there were categories set up.

There was category 1, which was the one to be paid, like the National Guard, for 48 drills.

Then there was category 2, that was not to receive 48 but 24 drills, paid drills.

And there was category 3, that were to receive a lesser number.

You finally got down to category 4, which only got paid once a quarter.

Now——

Mr. JOHNSON. In the law that we passed, I don't remember anything like that, or any language that would permit them to make categories like that.

General EVANS. No. That may be so, Mr. Johnson, but they had so much money that was appropriated, and it was not enough to take care of all of the units that they hoped to take care of.

Mr. JOHNSON. Isn't there somebody that knows what they are going to have, and how much money they will need next year?

General EVANS. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was there just a lack of any cohesive group who is supposed to sponsor Reserve activities?

General EVANS. That is certainly one of the reasons.

But you will recall that I read from the statement of the Appropriations Committee, where they had actually reduced the amount of money from the amount of money requested. And why? Because there weren't units organized and they didn't see any reason to appropriate that amount of money until the units were organized.

Digitized by Google

Now, the same thing applies to the matter of inactive duty training pay. We are faced with the situation very probably this year of not being able to expend more than approximately 50 percent of the amount that was appropriated and all because there were not units organized so that they could train and so that they could draw the pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. You think we ought to have a subcommittee to bore into this and find out and see if we can work that out?

General EVANS. It is essential that that be done, Mr. Johnson, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. General, you said something that intrigued me very much. You said there is no bureau or agency set up comparable to the National Guard agency in the Department.

General EVANS. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And you think it would lend strength to fighting the battles of the Reserve both in Congress and in the Department if such a similar set-up was put in operation in the Department?

General EVANS. I do, indeed.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Price, any questions?

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, yes.

General, do you have any hope that these two special committees appointed by Secretary Royall and Secretary Symington might bring any answer to these questions?

General EVANS. No, Mr. Price. Those committees are only for the purpose of determining a relative troop basis of the National Guard and the Reserve. It has nothing to do with organizing units. It has nothing to do with training units. It has nothing to do with anything else.

Mr. PRICE. They are not going to go into these questions at all?

General EVANS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Rivers.

Mr. RIVERS. General, I was noticing here your listing and cataloging the five points enunciated by General Bradley.

General EVANS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. It looks to me as though he tosses it right back into the laps of Congress. They say the reason that these things never came about is because they didn't have the money, such as the lack of funds for training and instruction—which, of course, is money, lack of training facilities—which is money, and lack of equipment—which is money.

Now, I would like to know whether the President is at fault, or the Bureau of the Budget, which didn't permit you to have the officers and men, or whether Congress organically—at the beginning—is responsible? Would you care to enlighten us a little on that?

General EVANS. You will recall, Mr. Rivers, that I added a sixth point. I quoted General Bradley's five points and I added a sixth point, which was in our opinion the reason for the past failure of this whole Reserve program, and that was a failure to create organized units.

Now, it doesn't take much money to organize a unit. It takes money when you start getting facilities and when you start getting equipment, and when you start paying people to go to camp, and so forth, but it doesn't cost money to create a unit. That is only a matter of issuing an order that such and such unit will be created in such and such a spot, and assigning officers to that unit.

Digitized by Google

Now, that is the start of this thing. You can't do anything about training. You have no need for facilities. You have no need for equipment. You haven't any need for money. You haven't any need for anything, until you first create organized units.

Mr. RIVERS. Well, would you say—would you hazard a guess—that they did not attach sufficient importance to the need for organizing this organization? In other words, they put other things ahead of it; would you say that?

General EVANS. That is a rather mild way of putting it, I would say.

Mr. RIVERS. Let me ask you this: Would you hazard a guess that somewhere along the line somebody thought they were going to federalize the National Guard and therefore they would wait and cross this bridge later on?

General EVANS. No; I don't know that that was the case. I have no way of knowing, of course.

Mr. RIVERS. Of course, they did think about that, you know.

General EVANS. It goes back further than that, Mr. Rivers.

I have heard, I think, that General Palmer paraphrased rather well two lines of thinking in the Regular service, what might be termed the Washingtonian line of thought and the Uptonian line of thought. The Uptonian theory might be very briefly paraphrased as follows: "Yes, we need civilians in time of war, we need them to fight battles, but they are no good anyway so we might just as well not do anything with them in time of peace; we will simply use them as filler replacements and put them in the Army." But the Washingtonian line of thought is quite different.

Mr. RIVERS. What is the origin of the Uptonian theory that you mentioned?

General EVANS. Upton was the man who wrote a book on military policy I think following the Civil War.

The Washington line of thought is quite different, and it is the one that we subscribe to. That is: "Yes, we have to use civilians to fight an all-out battle, an all-out war, but if we are going to use them let us do something about them in times of peace, and let us give them all the training we can."

Now, I am rather inclined to believe that too many times the Uptonian theory has been too high in the thoughts of many people in the Regular service.

Mr. SHORT. We might as well be frank and blunt about it. I think the reason you haven't had an organized reserve is because the Regular Establishment had very little interest and very little desire to create one. They didn't want it.

Mr. RIVERS. You think that that can be cured by a clear, concise, unequivocal, and definite program laid down by the Congress?

General EVANS. I certainly do, Mr. Rivers.

Mr. RIVERS. You think that is the only answer to it?

General EVANS. In my way of thinking, it is the only answer.

Mr. RIVERS. Thank you, sir. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if you had an agency set up like the National Guard Agency in the Department, that would be your first method to bring it about?

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. Yes, with a Secretary over both. That is the first step in this thing.

I think eventually we are going to have to do in the Army and the Air what has been done in the Navy. We are going to have to have an over-all Army bill, as far as the Reserve program is concerned, and we are going to have an over-all Air bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we are, during this session of Congress, going to try to put these two services in good shape, as far as legislation is concerned, as has been done for the last 15 or 16 years for the Navy.

General EVANS. I will say amen to that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt, go ahead.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that you made a complaint along the same lines about a year ago that you are making today?

General EVANS. Mr. Van Zandt, I have been making this complaint for 3 years without stopping.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And is it not true that members of this committee at that time, when questioning representatives of the Army, were informed to the effect that the Reserve organization could not be set up on a permanent basis because the Reserve officers were still moving around and had not yet established a permanent address?

General EVANS. That was one of the reasons: yes, sir.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And is it not true that they came before this committee and asked for the passage of what is now Public Law 460?

General EVANS. That is correct.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. To provide drill pay.

General EVANS. That is right.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Giving them the authority to organize units: Type A, type B, and type C?

General EVANS. That is true.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And they assured us that we would have an organized reserve in the near future.

And is it not true that the Army has not taken advantage of the provisions of Public Law 460, by failing to set up type A, type B, and type C units to meet the requirements of our national defense?

General EVANS. Yes. They have started but it still hasn't been done in any degree.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, the type A units that are in existence today—what type of equipment do they have?

General EVANS. Well, I am going to have to defer to my good friend, General Westover, to answer that question.

I can say that it is so small that it is rather ridiculous.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And type B—do they have any equipment at all?

General EVANS. They can't get enough training equipment.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And what is happening to type C?

General EVANS. Well, they have no equipment.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is a paper organization?

General EVANS. Well, it is not a paper organization—in one sense, yes, you might call it that. It is officers only.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, did I understand you to say that the money is available to pay for drills, but they are not taking advantage of it?

General EVANS. They have not been able because regulations were not prepared in time to allow any pay to be made during the first quarter.

Digitized by Google

The regulations are out now and the first pay I believe was made here the other day to a finance unit, which I think was pay for one meeting during, I think, the second quarter of the year.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. General, you represent the Reserve Officers Association of the United States?

General EVANS. That is correct.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And you in your representation not alone represent the Army and the Air Force, but you also represent the Reserve officers of the Navy?

General EVANS. That is correct.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, have these other component parts of our defense been able to set up an Organized Reserve Establishment, or Reserve Establishment, where the men attend drills and the volunteers also attend drills?

General EVANS. You are referring to the Navy?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is correct.

General EVANS. Yes.

I would be very happy if the Army program and the Air program was anywhere near the situation that exists in the Naval Reserve at the present time.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, a moment ago the question was asked of you to explain just what was going on as far as the composite units are concerned.

General EVANS. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that the Navy has composite units, and that they are very well organized and functioning?

General EVANS. Yes. But you have quite a different situation in the Navy than you do in the Army, for instance. You do not have quite the cleavage of the branch of service that we are burdened with in the Army. You can take your technical people and group them together, for instance, into a composite group of the Navy, and they would all be interested in the same type of training. That is comparable to what we call a training unit. I don't think you have anything in the Navy that is quite the same as we have called the composite group in the Army.

Now, the Air has somewhat the same type of problem as the Navy. They can create composite groups or training groups, whichever you care to call them, because they have people that are interested in motors, for instance, and they can group a set of officers together in that group and they would all have a common interest in training.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Well, the Navy has a composite group in which they train at least half a dozen different groups of individuals: Navigation, electronics, administration, and so forth. Then they have specialist units.

General EVANS. That is right.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Why is it not possible for the Army to set up special units?

General EVANS. It would be possible, and they are doing that in the training units.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Now, if the Navy has been successful in setting up these specialist units all over the country, and the officers and men are training on the voluntary basis, why is it that the Army has not set that up.

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. I can't answer. It would take too long an answer to give you on that, Mr. Van Zandt.

The fact is that 3 years have gone by. And the Navy conceived it, and the Navy did it, but the Army and the Air Force did not conceive it, and neither did they do it.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. In other words, the responsibility for the failure there rests upon the shoulders of the Army.

General EVANS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And upon the shoulders of the Congress if the Congress doesn't do something about it.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And with the cooperation of the committee, I hope we will make a little program on that.

Mr. Gavin.

Mr. GAVIN. In your statement here on page 9 you say:

> We previously understood that plans for this Volunteer Air Reserve group were such that these Reserve officers would be given no opportunity for promotion, for credits that would allow them to remain in the service, nor would they be given the opportunity to gain credits for qualifying them under Public Law 810, the Reserve retirement law. I am now informed that this has been changed, and that an opportunity will be given to the Volunteer Air Reserve not only for promotion, but for retention and qualifications for retirement.

I wonder if you would discuss that with us, the comparative situation between the Regular Army and the Reserve, so far as retirement benefits? It have had some inquiries on that, and I would like to get your opinion on that. What are the changes that have been made?

General EVANS. We were very much disturbed some time ago and called into being our National Air Force Committee. It met out in Kansas City. This committee had many problems that they felt were vital, but they centered on one thing, and one thing alone, and wrote a report accordingly. That had to do with the so-called Volunteer Air Reserve.

It appeared at that time that we were faced with a plan or program of the Air Force that would take a limited number of a quarter of a million officers, for instance, and put them in the Organized Reserve where they would be in units, and where they would be given training, flying time, and all the rest, but that the difference between that relatively small group and the total number of officers that existed would go into the Volunteer Reserve. And at that time it was their understanding that the plans were not to give them opportunities for training—no put them into units. For instance, in not being in a unit, they could not attend a training assembly and consequently could gain no points that would help qualify them for Public Law 810.

In other words, if that were done and furthermore if they were not being allowed to be promoted, what interest would there be for the officer to remain? He would simply throw up his hands and say, "Well, it isn't worth while, I will quit and let somebody else carry on."

But I think it is probably through the good offices of General Quesada that that plan, which I understand had been originally conceived, was eliminated. And now I am assured—no later than yesterday or the day before, when I went over to General Quesada's office—that the present plan does contemplate that the Volunteer Air Reserve will be grouped into training units or composite units, that they will be allowed to be promoted on the same basis as those in the Organized Reserve——

Digitized by Google

Mr. GAVIN. I am interested in the basis of retirement. That is what I want you to talk about.

General EVANS. Do you mean the provisions of Public Law 810?

Mr. GAVIN. Yes. How would they qualify—these men that are in the Reserve?

General EVANS. Reserve officers can qualify under Public Law 810 by several things. Basically, the law sets up that they must make 50 points a year. And it states that 1 day of active duty will count as a point. By attending an assembly they can gain a point, if it is 2-hour instruction. By doing extension courses, now the Army has put in a regulation that 3 hours' work will give you one point. By sitting on boards or by doing any kind of Reserve work that is considered military instruction, they get a point. And that helps build up this required number of points so they can be qualified.

It is a rather detailed construction. I would be very happy to come to your office and to give you the detail on it.

Mr. GAVIN. All right.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, just one word:

How long is that report that your committee made in Kansas City, or wherever it was that they met?

General EVANS. You mean in number of pages?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes.

General EVANS. Just two pages long.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like for it to be put in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Put it in the record.

General EVANS. Very good, I will have it put in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, we will have to take a recess until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, when we will ask the General to return, and at which time Mr. Symington will be here.

But before we break up, I want to advise the committee that I have been notified by the Expenditures Committee that the amendment I submitted on behalf of the committee with reference to the reorganization bill—in regard to reorganization plans with reference to the National Defense, be not mixed up with other departmental reorganizations—has been tentatively agreed to. So in the reorganization bill, it has been tentatively agreed to adopt an amendment to the effect that whenever the National Defense is dealt with it will come in a separate package.

Now, Mr. Forrestal has requested that a bill be introduced to establish the Office of Undersecretary. It meets with the approval of officials for such a bill to be introduced. I am asking Mr. Short, on behalf of the committee, to introduce the bill and just as soon as we finish with this bill we will have that bill up before the committee, at which time I will ask Mr. Short to preside over the committee and to consider the bill for the establishment of the position of an Undersecretary.

Is that satisfactory to you, to introduce it?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Undersecretary of what?

The CHAIRMAN. The Undersecretary of National Defense.

Now, we will take a recess until tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 11:50 a. m., the committee adjourned.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Thursday, February 3, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

Before we commence the hearing on the bill under consideration, I will ask the clerk to read a letter that I received from Secretary Sullivan, and then pass the letter over to the press table. I hope the members of the press will be able to get all of the information out of the letter that it will be necessary for them to fix up their articles without coming to me, because this is all I know about it.

Mr. HARPER (reading):

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, February 2, 1949.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN. It has been the Navy's policy to inform the members of the appropriate committees of the Congress whenever substantial changes in operating plans or operating forces are in prospect. In this way it is believed that the members of these committees would be in a position to answer the many inquiries they will receive from their constituents.

In order to enter fiscal year 1950 with the operating forces and the supporting establishment which the Navy plans to maintain during that fiscal year, it is necessary to start at once to reduce our present forces. These reductions must be initiated at this time because insofar as practicable the changes contemplated must be accomplished prior to June 30, 1949. It is imperative that the costs of this reduction be defrayed with fiscal year 1949 funds and that the planned level of operation be reached at the beginning of the fiscal year so that it can be maintained constant throughout the year.

To reach the fiscal 1950 figures, it is necessary to make the following reduction in personnel:

Regular Navy:
Present enlisted personnel strength	371,700
Average fiscal-year 1950 strength	350,000
Reduction	21,700
Regular Marine Corps:
Present enlisted personnel strength	76,500
Average fiscal year 1950 strength	69,895
Reduction	6,605
Reduction in commissioned officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps	1,195
Total reductions	29,500

In order to achieve the most efficient and economical transition to the fiscal year 1950 position, and to reduce diversion from the operating forces of personnel needed for inactivations to the minimum practicable, a program of inactivations has been prepared and integrated with the schedule of newly constructed and converted ships joining the fleet during fiscal year 1950.

Three attack carriers, nine light cruisers, and three antiaircraft cruisers have been selected for inactivation. These ships are: U. S. S. Princeton (CV-37), U. S. S. Antietam (CV-36), U. S. S. Tarawa (CV-40), U. S. S. Providence (CL-82), U. S. S. Little Rock (CL-92), U. S. S. Huntington (CL-107), U. S. S. Portsmouth (CL-102), U. S. S. Dayton (CL-105), U. S. S. Astoria (CL-90), U. S. S. Topeka (CL-67), U. S. S. Duluth (CL-87), U. S. S. Atlanta (CL-104), U. S. S. Fresno (CLAA-121), U. S. S. Oakland (CLAA-95), U. S. S. Tucson (CLAA-98).

Of these vessels, the Fresno, Dayton, and Duluth have already been ordered to the Reserve Fleet for inactivation.

In addition to these major combatant types, it is planned to inactivate 31 amphibious types, 5 patrol craft, 4 destroyer minesweepers, and 17 auxiliary and small amphibious vessels. This added to the 15 major combatant types being inactivated makes a total of 72 vessels to be inactivated.

No changes are contemplated in the planned additions to the fleet during 1950 of newly commissioned vessels, which are as follows: U. S. S. Oriskany (CV–34), U. S. S. Salem (CA–139), U. S. S. Roanoke (CL–145), U. S. S. Epperson (DDE–719), U. S. S. Basilone (DDE–824), U. S. S. Carpenter (DDK–825), U. S. S. Robt. A. Owens (DDK–827).

Plans for 1950 emphasize antisubmarine readiness. To this end, 10 Reserve Fleet destroyers, now undergoing conversion to destroyer-escort types (DDE) and 1 light carrier (CVL), will be reactivated and commissioned durinfi fiscal year 1950, as well as 14 smaller craft.

With respect to the principal combatant types, 8 attack carriers will be active during fiscal 1950 instead of the 11 now being operated, and 170 destroyer types will be assigned to the active fleets compared to the 146 now being operated scheduled this fiscal year. The number of submarines in commission will be increased by two. These changes, plus inactivations of other types, result in a net reduction from the present active fleet strength of 755 vessels to a total strength of 731.

With respect to the naval aviation program, operating aircraft will be reduced from the present 8,183 to 7,765. Lower levels of operating aircraft and available personnel will necessitate a corresponding reduction in naval air stations and naval air facilities. It is now planned to inactivate nine stations, and to place three in a maintenance status, as follows:

To be inactivated: Naval air facility, Naha, Okinawa; Naval air facility, Adak, Aleutian Islands; Marine Corps air station, Ewa, Oahu; Naval air station, Sangley Point, Philippine Islands; Naval air facility, Honolulu, T. H.; Naval air station, El Centro, Calif.; Naval air station, Santa Ana, Calif.; Naval air facility, Weymouth, Mass.; Naval air station, Orote, Guam.

To be placed in maintenance status: Naval air station, Barbers Point, Oahu; Naval air station, Pearl Harbor; Naval air station, Glynco, Ga.

In addition, the Naval air station, Seattle, will be converted to a Naval Reserve air station, except that the alteration and repair facilities there will continue to be utilized and supported by the Regular Navy.

With respect to other-than-air shore stations for fleet support, detailed surveys are now being conducted to determine where reductions necessitated by fiscal year 1950 plans can be made in the Navy's shore establishment with the least detriment to over-all fleet support. Final determination of the specific program of shore station reductions awaits the outcome of these surveys. However, planned reductions in the level of matériel improvement and in maintenance of the operating forces will entail a general reduction in the scale of activity at naval shore establishments supporting the fleet, including the employment levels at naval shipyards.

In accordance with our understanding, I have addressed identical letters to the chairmen of the Senate Armed Services and Appropriations Committees and the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. I am sending copies of this letter to the members of the Armed Services Committees and to the Military Subcommittees of the Appropriations Committees.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could one of our clerks make copies of this letter for each member?

The CHAIRMAN. A copy of it has been mailed to all the members of the committee, I understand.

I might add that in the present budget there is a reduction of $573,000,000 under the 1949 budget.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, yesterday when we recessed General Evans, representing the Reserve, was testifying.

General, have you completed your statement, or are there any other questions from any members of the committee who did not have an opportunity to ask you any questions yesterday?

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. I have nothing to add, Mr. Chairman, unless there are some questions from members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Any members have any questions to ask the general?

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Chairman, I have two questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clemente.

Mr. CLEMENTE. You made some remark with reference to the joint use of armories. Can you explain that, please?

General EVANS. The question had to do with the use of armories for the Reserve.

The problem of armories for the Reserve is quite a serious problem. because we don't have any. There isn't much opportunity at the present time to obtain any, until we can receive some appropriations from the Congress of the United States.

There is quite a little talk about the joint use of armories. I do not have much hope for that to be very effective because the National Guard armories at the present time are small. They are too small for the National Guard.

As far as the Air is concerned, they have a problem that is very similar to the Navy.

The use of armories today is quite different than it was in the old days, where you had to have a big drill floor with supply rooms. Now, you do not think in terms of the need of a drill floor so much as you do small rooms where you can have a motor mounted where people can sit around and study the motor or where they can have a radar set in a room where there can be chairs around it, and where they can study the radar set, and things of that sort.

The Navy have approached that problem in a very practical way by building so-called temporary construction.

We are hoping that we can persuade the Appropriations Committee to give us money that will allow us to build construction that will be somewhat similar to that of the Navy. It certainly is all that we need. We do not need and we do not want monumental buildings. We would be perfectly delighted to have some sort of temporary construction that would house equipment and allow the units to train.

Does that answer your question, Mr. Clemente?

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions?

Mr. CLEMENTE. One more question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Have you received any surplus equipment, left over from World War II?

General EVANS. Yes; there has been a very small amount of equipment that has been turned over to the Reserves. It is very small.

Any questions by any other members?

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one thing?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hébert.

Mr. HÉBERT. Just for the record, and to clarify something in my mind, General, as I understand it the Reserve Association is constituted of officers?

General EVANS. The Organized Reserve Corps?

Mr. HÉBERT. Yes.

General EVANS. No; that is not correct.

Mr. HÉBERT. It doesn't show anywhere in the record what constitutes exactly the Organized Reserve. I want to differentiate between the Organized Reserve and the National Guard. What is the difference?

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. Prior to World War II there was a distinct difference because in those days the National Guard consisted of officers and men, and the Reserve between the two World Wars did not have any enlisted men to speak of. There was authorization for it, but we didn't have them.

Now, since the end of World War II there have been some 400,000 enlisted men from the Army and some 180,000 from the Air, making a total of something over 600,000, who were enlisted men, as such, in World War II, who enlisted in the Army or Air Reserve.

Now, they are in the Reserve at the present time as enlisted men, unless their enlistment has run out and they failed to renew. As I said yesterday, the enlistment was for 3 years, and most of them came in in 1945, therefore their 3-year enlistment ran out last year, and many of them have failed to reenlist.

Mr. HÉBERT. Well, what are the demands of duty, General, on the National Guard as compared to the demand of duty on the Organized Reserve? That is what I am confused about. Both have certain obligations.

General EVANS. Oh, yes.

Mr. HÉBERT. Both have certain demands.

General EVANS. I spoke of three types of units, Mr. Hébert, yesterday that exist and are planned on in the Reserve. They are sometimes known as class A, B, and C units. The A is a unit that has a full complement of officers and a full complement of men. Therefore, that unit, that A unit, is just the same as the National Guard so far as personnel is concerned. It is supposed to have the same obligations as the National Guard. It has the same number of drill periods per year. It is supposed to have the same armory facilities, the same storage facilities, the same equipment——

Mr. HÉBERT. Why the duplication of effort? Why couldn't both of these organizations be merged into one unit of the National Guard?

General EVANS. Of course——

Mr. HÉBERT. Since they duplicate efforts, they duplicate demands, they duplicate obligations——

General EVANS. That is true. It could be. It could all be National Guard or all Reserve.

It so happens that the law at the present time provides for a National Guard and for a Reserve. That is the National Defense Act which provides for that at the present time.

Mr. HÉBERT. Of course, that doesn't make it right because the law provides for it. I am just wondering why the duplication of effort in an era when we are trying to unify services.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Mr. Hébert, there is not a duplication of effort. The National Guard has a certain definite function assigned to it, which is to be in a state of readiness and organized to support the policies of the War Department in case of national emergency and in peacetime to be the strength of the governors.

The Reserve is based on the premise that it is an organization of patriotic men who have or who have not had previous military training and desire to be organized for the purpose in case of emergency to be better equipped than if they hadn't been organized.

Digitized by Google

It is entirely separate and distinct; is that correct?

General EVANS. Yes; but it is a little stronger than that, Mr. Chairman, at the present time, because the present concept of the Reserve is that there are certain units of the Reserve that are just as much organized as the National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Any other questions? We have to move along, gentlemen.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Every National Guard officer is also a Reserve officer, automatically, isn't he?

General EVANS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought they had two commissions: One in the State and one in the Reserve.

General EVANS. That was the case at one time, but I do not believe it is that way now.

General Reckord is here. He can explain that better than I can.

General RECKORD. Mr. Johnson, at one time the law provided that every National Guard officer would receive a Federal commission in the Organized Reserve. That was changed. At the present time the Federal commission the National Guard officer receives is in the National Guard of the United States. But grade for grade they are equal—they are alike and equal—with the ROTC.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, the strength that you gave yesterday was the strength of the Reserves?

General EVANS. Only.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

General EVANS. That is not a duplication.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Thank you very much, General——

General EVANS. One other thing, Mr. Chairman. You asked yesterday—I believe it was Mr. Durham—that a copy of our National Air Force Committee report be inserted in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General EVANS. I hand this to the clerk.

(The report is as follows:)

INTERIM REPORT OF AIR FORCE AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES

SECTION I. AUTHORITY AND ASSEMBLY

1. The air force affairs committee is established as one of the national standing committees of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States, under article B-7, paragraph (c), of the revised constitution adopted at the Denver convention, June 16–19, 1948. The constitution provides that, "This committee shall act in an advisory capacity on all matters of policy and procedure concerning the Air Force."

2. This committee met on call of the chairman, November 20–21, 1948, in Kansas City, Mo.

Members present: Lt. Col. A. H. Wait, USAFR, chairman; Col. M. J. Brummer, USAFR, vice president, air force affairs, ROA (ex officio); Col. D. Arthur Walker, USAFR; Maj. Fred C. Armagast, USAFR; Capt. Milton Zacharias, USAFR, junior vice president, air force affairs, ROA (ex officio).

Present representing USAF: Col. W. C. Eareckson, USAF, commanding officer, 2238 AFRTC; Lt. Col. John C. Crain, USAF, headquarters USAF office, chief civilian components group—DCS/O.

Digitized by Google

Present representing national headquarters, ROA: Lt. Col. John W. Richardson, USAFR, past vice president, ROA; Maj. Kenneth P. Laird, USAFR, director, air force affairs, ROA; Capt. R. L. Wynes, USAFR, executive committeeman, air force affairs, ROA.

SECTION II. PURPOSE

The purpose of the meeting was to aid national defense. and strengthen the United States Air Force, through a consideration of problems of organization, administration and training of the Air Force Reserve in order to make appropriate recommendations to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the Reserve program.

SECTION III. GENERAL COMMENTS

1. The Air Force affairs committee represents a membership of 37,000 Air Force officers comprising the air force section of the Reserve Officers Association.

2. Although numerous problems were discussed, the committee agreed unanimously to limit the present report to problems involved in the organization, administration. and training of the Volunteer Air Reserve. These problems are the most pressing and affect the greatest number of Air Reserve officers. The committee plans to continue the study of Air Force Reserve problems at future meetings.

3. The committee has attempted to be constructive in its criticism and objective in its recommendations.

SECTION IV. THE PROBLEM OF THE VOLUNTEER AIR RESERVE

Under Air Force Regulation 45–5, the Air Force Reserve consists of the Organized Air Reserve, Volunteer Air Reserve, Inactive Air Reserve, and Honorary Air Reserve. Present regulations and future programing for the Volunteer Air Reserve provide for no organized training, no inactive duty pay, no promotion to higher grade, no active duty, in fact, little incentive to retain Reserve status.

SECTION V. FACTS BEARING ON THE PROBLEM

1. The Volunteer Air Reserve, as presently constituted, comprises approximately 85 percent of the total Air Reserve forces, or about 200,000 out of a total 234,000 officers and men, using figures as of January 1, 1948.

2. A large, active, well-trained Volunteer Air Reserve is necessary to provide continual replacements for T. O. and E. units and mobilization assignments as personnel drop out for business or personal reasons, or change their place of residence.

3. The Volunteer Air Reserve can, if properly trained and their interest preserved, furnish a large pool of qualified officers in addition to those in the T. O. and E. units and mobilization assignments for the expansion of the Air Force in term of emergency, eliminating, at least in part, the necessity for commissioning untrained personnel direct from civil life.

4. The Air Force needs the good will and support of this large segment of the Air Force Reserve in implementing national defense policy and in furthering Air Force projects.

5. A large, well-trained Volunteer Air Reserve is desirable for the purpose of maintaining continued pressure on T. O. and E. and mobilization personnel to operate at peak efficiency through the knowledge that some Volunteer Reservist is anxiously waiting to take his place.

6. Although little or no assistance has been received from the Air Force, many composite squadrons have developed programs for training the local volunteer air reservist. In certain instances, the expenses incident thereto, including rental of classroom and training space, have, of necessity, been paid from personal funds. The allocation of surplus equipment, little better than salvage, would greatly assist these locally developed programs.

7. The interest of a limited number of Volunteer Reservists has been retained by the efforts and initiative of individual officers in the face of a discouraging lack of support from the Air Force. This situation cannot, however, be expected to continue.

8. The Volunteer Air Reserve contains many mature and efficient officers with varied experience and skills, whose retention in the military service is highly desirable in the interest of national defense. These officers are more desirous of recognition of the value of their service and in promotion to higher grade, when qualified, than in monetary returns.

9. Present membership in the Volunteer Air Reserve in no way constitutes a reflection on an officer's interest, ability, or efficiency. Limitations on M. O. S., grade and/or numbers in T. O. and E. or mobilization assignment, or his place of residence, may be responsible for an officer's exclusion from the T. O. and E. or mobilization assignment program. Relegation to the Volunteer Air Reserve has, however, come to be considered as a failure to meet T. O. and E. or mobilization assignment standards with resulting stigma attached.

10. By proper use of the talent in the Air Force Reserve, it should be possible to develop a training program for the Volunteer Air Reserve which will meet the needs of the reservist and which can be conducted for a cost to the Government which would be negligible in comparison to over-all Reserve appropriations.

SECTION VI. CONCLUSIONS

1. A large, interested, well-trained Volunteer Air Reserve is important in national defense and is essential to the implementation of the Air Force T .O. and E. and Mobilization Assignment programs.

2. The Volunteer Air Reserve contains a pool of reserve manpower on which the Government has spent large sums of money in specialized military training and this training should be conserved for use in future emergencies.

3. Present policies and regulations have taken little cognizance of the Volunteer Air Reserve. Where they have, the results have been to discourage Reservists from continuing in the Reserve, with the consequent dissipation of trained manpower.

SECTION VIII. RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That the use of the designation, "Volunteer Air Reserve" be discontinued. The Air Force Reserve would then consist of the Organized Air Reserve, Inactive Air Reserve, and Honorary Air Reserve. The Organized Air Reserve would be divided into two categories, without distinguishing names; category one, comprising those Reservists assigned to T. O. and E. units or having Mobilization Assignments, and, category two, comprising those active reservists who do not have such assignments.

2. That inactive duty pay be confined to those Reservists in category one of the Organized Air Reserve, as defined above, in line with present policy.

3. That Air Force regulations be revised to permit the promotion to next higher grade of qualified Reserve officers in category two, as well as those in category one, as defined above, of the Organized Air Reserve. Until a grade structure is established for category two, the maximum number of officers in any grade could be based on the percentage of officers in the respective grades in the Regular Air Force.

4. (a) That allocation be made from available funds, and provision be made in future budget estimates, for funds and personnel to permit the operation of a realistic ground training program for category two of the Organized Air Reserve.

(b) As a part of such a training program, it is recommended that steps be taken to implement the provisions of paragraph 5, AF Regulation 45–10, permitting inactive duty training without pay by establishing and publicizing training assignments, similar to Mobilization Assignments, at various staff levels. Officers volunteering for such training assignments to serve without pay and to be in addition to the number of officers holding regular Mobilization Assignments.

5. Training directives and syllabi should be promulgated by the Air Force Command charged with the training of the Air Force Reserve in order to insure uniformity of such training.

For members of the committee.

A. H. WAIT,
Lieutenant Colonel, USAFR, Chairman, Air Force Affairs Committee, Reserve Officers Association.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much——

General EVANS. Just one thing. I want to clarify one statement that I made yesterday. I am afraid it may be misunderstood.

Mr. Cole asked, Did I recommend a Reserve as required by the national security or did I recommend a Reserve with no limitation except as imposed by budgetary limitations? I would like to make just one short statement about it.

Digitized by Google

In considering my answer, in which I replied in substance I favored the latter type of Reserve, I am concerned that the answer might be misconstrued.

Obviously, I recommend no greater Reserve than that required by national security. On the other hand, when we look at World War I only, a comparatively small number of Reserves were required. In World War II we had over 12,000,000 men and women in the armed services. In World War III—and I pray God there may not be one—who can say what the top figure may be?

Mr. Chairman, thank you very much for allowing me to appear before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, General.

Now, Mr. Secretary Symington, you and General Vandenberg come around, please, and also Mr. Whitney—all of you come up. Now, Mr. Secretary, you got the background of things during your absence. I don't know whether we are in the rocks or in the shoals, but we are here now to get from you the benefit of your views and that of your military experts.

Now, go ahead, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Thank you, sir.

As you know, sir, I have been in the Appropriations Committee for 2 days. Otherwise I would have been here.

I was very sorry to hear, and in some places to read, the testimony that was given by the National Guard people. I have a statement here with respect to our comments on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead, sir.

Secretary SYMINGTON. And, also, when I get through, Mr. Whitney, who sat on the Gray Board, and under whom is the function of the civilian components, and General Quesada and his aids, as well as General McConnell, may have some thoughts.

I only had a chance to read this testimony last night, but I have a short statement here commenting on it.

When I came into the Air Force 3 years ago, about 5 months after VJ-day, it became at once obvious that one of the most serious peacetime problems the Air Force would have would be the so-called civilian components: The Air Reserve and the Air National Guard.

Prior to the war the Air Force consisted of some 25,000 people. The logic of the new war increased this, in some 4 years, to over 2½ million people. Therefore, when this force was demobilized there were hundreds of thousands of young Americans anxious to serve their country but with no Reserve structure to take care of them. Efforts were made to handle this, but the amount of money was very limited and the general problem was very great.

As soon as the war was over there were many areas of disagreement between the Army and the Air Force. This was especially true in the National Guard Bureau. And one of the things the Air Force looked forward to with greatest satisfaction was the possibility of controlling their own civilian components comparable to the way the Navy controlled theirs.

Nevertheless, in the final days of the unification bill, when everybody was compromising in order to get any bill, the National Guard interests wedged into the act the fact that the National Guard Bureau would continue to handle the Air National Guard along with the National Guard. And this meant that whereas the Air Forces was equal under the Unification Act with the other services it would in the usual case be under Army officers with respect to its Air Guard.

In addition to this condition, the Air Force had another unfortunate problem. Instead of the streamlined position of the Navy with respect to its Air Reserve, as one Reserve: The Navy Air Reserve, the Air Force had both the Air National Guard and the Air Reserve—one controlled by the National Guard interests and the States, and the other by the Air Force.

As a result of this condition in many localities, there was and is heavy, bitter disagreement between the Air National Guard and the Air Reserve, and it is generally taken out in the end on the Regular Air Force.

The situation with respect to the Air National Guard and its operations could not be more different than that of the Army National Guard in its operations. Perhaps two illustrations would suffice. The National Guard can drill with rifles and field equipment, but the Air National Guard must at all times have highly intricate planes equipped and maintained at the highest level of efficiency in order to prevent fatal accidents. Secondly, there is no State problem of State lines in the National Guard. In the State where I live, if at its two main airports the wind is in a particular direction, it is not possible to gain altitude without going over the adjoining State.

As an illustration of the problem of the Air Reserve, in 1949 $73,000,000 was appropriated for the Air Reserve to handle 419,282 military personnel. The Air National Guard was given $78,000,000 to handle 41,188 military personnel.

The CHAIRMAN. Read those figures again, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir. As an illustration of the problem of the Air Reserve, in 1949 $73,000,000 was appropriated for the Air Reserve to handle 419,282 military personnel. The Air National Guard was given $78,000,000 to handle 41,188 military personnel.

In other words, the Air Reserve was given $174 a year per capita and the Air National Guard $1,893 per man, or over 10 times as much.

But that is not all the story. In addition to those figures—I didn't have the time to get the exact figures on planes—we assign our planes to the Air National Guard and the planes we assign to them are all modern planes and the planes assigned to the Reserves in the main are trainers. So the figures, when we get the final figures for you, will be very much more in favor of the Air National Guard as against the Reserve.

After the National Security Act was passed, and in an effort to streamline the Reserve units of the country in the interest of the taxpayer, the so-called Gray Board was established. The composition of this Board included Assistant Secretary Whitney here, Assistant Secretary Gray, and Assistant Secretary Brown of the Navy, as well as the National Guard officer with perhaps the outstanding war record of any National Guard officer in World War II. This Board was unanimous in favoring control of the Air National Guard by the Air Force.

Mr. HEBÉRT. Mr. Chairman, will the Secretary identify the individual he just referred to?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Lieutenant General McClain, sir, who rose from a relatively low position to commanding a full Army corps.

Mr. HEBÉRT. I just wanted his identification.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

This Board was unanimous in favoring control of the Air National Guard by the Air Force. And this was after eight months of intensive study and the hearing of scores of witnesses. And the Secretary of Defense and the President approved the findings of the Gray Board with respect to the Air Force, and, of course, so did we.

Almost at once we were notified by the National Guard interests that they would battle us to the end against this legislation. I was told personally that if we attempted to take the Air National Guard out of the National Guard Bureau the National Guard would oppose any group program recommendation whatever by the Air Force and would oppose the principle of flying pay.

The CHAIRMAN. They were getting ready to fight you, then, weren't they?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Obviously this could not be considered as against what we thought was right in the interest of security of the United States.

After discussion with General Reckord it was agreed that a committee should be formed to study this question, which would include the head of the National Guard Bureau, and that the Air Force and the National Guard would make every effort to abide by the findings of this committee. It was agreed that it might be possible to maintain State identity and at the same time have the Air Force given that control considered essential to national security. And this committee has met twice.

Nevertheless, despite what is going on along those lines, the National Guard now considers it advisable to take the opportunity of this authorization bill to not only maintain the position of the National Guard interests over the Air Force but also to try to greatly increase the number of people and the number of groups.

In order to promote that position, the National Guard people before this committee have made implications with respect to why this bill was drawn, and the implications are not true.

There is nobody that knows better than the chairman that the bill was drawn in all sincerity and with no ulterior motives.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I tried to tell them the other day.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Thank you sir.

General Vandenberg in that connection said before your committee 2 days ago, and I quote:

> I would like to emphasize that the language of this section is broad enough to cover either the present type of organization of the civilian components or any organization which may be adopted by the Congress as a result of the Gray Board's recommendations or any recommendations. The organization of either the Air National Guard or of the Reserve need not be affected by this legislation.

In our opinion, many implications and certain statements in the testimony in addition to the above are not true.

The criticism of the Air Reserve is possibly justified because it has been a most difficult job over a period of years. But a comparison between the relative progress of the Air Reserve and the National Guard is extremely unfair because in all cases wherever possible the Air Forces favored the National Guard this because of the relative priority position the Air Force gave the National Guard in the over-all defense structure of the United States.

Now, it its effort to maintain and increase its control of air power, the National Guard interests used the favored position given it by the Air Force as a weapon against the ability of the Air Force.

May we ask you to consider the paradoxical position which the Air Force is now placed in. The President of the United States only recently criticized the Air Force publicly—its Reserve picture—and compared it unfavorably with the Navy, which has the simple structure of one Reserve unit—a very fine Reserve unit. And yet at this time we are asked by the National Guard interests to perpetuate this condition, in a bill in which this subject is not paramount, that very dual system which has made it impossible to administer efficiently in the past.

We believe that if this matter is to be included in the authorization bill it should not be decided until the findings of the ad hoc committee agreed upon makes its report and further investigation is made by the subcommittee suggested by the chairman.

The present wording of the bill will permit the status quo of the National Guard and any adjustment deemed advisable by the Congress.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, you said in your statement that some kind of negotiation had been open between you and the National Guard looking forward to solving this problem. Now, what was the nature and what progress was being made? You said something about working it out, whereby there was a certain amount of State control and it being under the Air Corps instead of through the National Guard Bureau—is that what you had in mind?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. As I caught what you meant, it was that the control of the Air National Guard would not be channeled through the National Guard set-up. It would deal with the ground force, but it would be under the Air Corps—that is, under you and under your Department; is that correct?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That isn't necessary, sir.

The basic reason for starting this ad hoc committee was in order to see if we could adjust the differences between the National Guard interests and the Air Force. They had their feeling about it and we had ours.

The more I have seen of it the more satisfied I am that we cannot have two Air National Guards so totally different from the concept of the National Guard—strikes, disturbances, and so forth—bucking each other all over the country in various communities, especially as we have been forced to choose——

The CHAIRMAN. When you use the word "two Air National Guards," you mean the Reserve and the Air National Guard?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; two Reserve components would be the right way to put it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Especially as it has been necessary for us to choose one against the other, with the constant bitterness that has come up.

Digitized by Google

Therefore, we thought if we had the committee—incidentally, the committee was our suggestion, and we also suggested that the head of the National Guard Bureau, General Cramer, be on the committee, and he has accepted, and the committee has also met twice—we might come in with a plan to present to you and this committee which would handle this matter without bringing it up as a matter for an authorization bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What progress are you making?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would think General Quesada could answer that better than I could. He is the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What progress are you making, General?

General QUESADA. Mr. Chairman, I would say we are making satisfactory progress. We have not come to specific conclusions. We have had two meetings. We are exploring the possibilities most pleasantly and successfully.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, heretofore the National Guard and the Air Corps have been working on this problem fairly satisfactorily?

General QUESADA. I would say the committee is going along satisfactorily, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think there will be any likelihood of reaching a satisfactory solution of this control between you two?

General QUESADA. I naturally would say "Yes," Mr. Chairman, because I am the chairman of the committee. I always hope for success in an activity——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the chairman of a committee doesn't always have that power.

Now, if the status quo is maintained, do you think that you could reach a satisfactory agreement with the Air National Guard in reference to all phases of it so that you can work in harmony and they would not, as the Secretary said, be fighting this and that proposal of the Air Corps?

General QUESADA. The answer to that is a categorical "Yes." I certainly hope to such an end. And I have reason to believe that an end to that effect could be reached.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how long a time will it take you to reach an agreement?

General QUESADA. We have set a goal of 6 weeks. Two weeks have transpired since we established the committee. We are trying to conclude it within 6 weeks. And we have so stated to all.

Mr. COLE. That is the 1st of March, then?

General QUESADA. We are trying to complete it by the 1st of March; yes, sir, Mr. Cole.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me digress from that thought and ask the Secretary this: You said $75,000,000 was given to the Reserves?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Seventy-three million, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Seventy-three million. And about the same amount was given to the National Guard?

Secretary SYMINGTON. $5,476,000 more, or $78,476,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Reserves got how many million?

Secretary SYMINGTON. The Reserves got $78,476,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And——

Secretary SYMINGTON. I beg your pardon. The Reserves got $73,000,000.

And what did the Guard get?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. $78,476,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Seventy-eight million?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you concentrated—of course, you spent all that money, haven't you?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I do not know as to the National Guard. The Reserves have not expended all that money, but expect to spend all that money this year.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Then you practically spent it and built up a very fine National Guard, have you not?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think the National Guard has done well; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think some witness testified there were 36,000 in the Guard, and you had about 27 groups, I think, in that. So you concentrated on the Guard?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We have concentrated on the Guard. We have thrown nearly all of our——

The CHAIRMAN. And you haven't used up your $73,000,000 on the Reserve. You couldn't concentrate on both of them at the same time, so you selected the Guard because you gave it such a prominent part in your continental defense scheme.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on that a little.

The Guard was considered to be part of the first-line defense of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. The Air Reserve we have done as much as we could for, but as we pointed out we had some 419,000 people in the Air Reserve and a great many more who wanted to get in the Air Reserve if they felt there was any chance of flying, whereas we only had a planned 41,000 in the Guard.

In addition to that, we gave the Guard every favored situation that we could, plus modern airplanes as against the old trainers we gave the Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, then, getting back to another thing: You think there should be only one unit outside of your Regular Establishment?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I beg your pardon, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. You think there should be only one group, and that would be the Reserve, instead of the Guard?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Not necessarily so, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. What would be your plan with reference to the Guard? Just state that, sir?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well our thought was we get the authorization bill—which, so far as I know, everybody though we should have: The Army and the Air Force along with the Navy—and then we would sit down with the Guard and this committee and see if we could reach an understanding, which I feel that we could. There is no desire for us to get any prerogative that isn't in the interest of security.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, what control would you advocate, or are you advocating over the Guard?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would like General Vandenberg to comment on that, with respect to what he thinks he needs if we are going to have anything that means anything in the way of air defense.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, the reason that we took up this method of coming together with the Reserve, the National Guard, and the Regular Air Force, under the chairmanship of General Quesada, was to take a look at the present rules and regulations and control that the Air Force has over the civilian components—to look at it with the view to seeing whether or not the present rules and regulations and methods gave us the best defense for the dollar, and to come up with the Reserves and the National Guard and the Regular Establishment looking at this problem from an over-all national defense point of view to see whether if by a slight adjustment here and a slight adjustment there we couldn't come up with an agreed solution where everybody could say that the control that we have is something to most efficiently spend the taxpayers' dollar for he air defense of the United States.

For us to say now while this ad hoc committee is going on exactly what control we need is something that I would rather not try and make a statement of until the committee comes up and we get the National Guard point of view, the Reserve point of view, and the Regular point of view, so that we all see together what the real problem is in this thing.

We do, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. It looks like we are being somewhat driven up against the proposition that we either have to decide this issue now or wait and see whether or not you could reach an agreement; is that it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I wouldn't think so because if we write the bill as you originally had it, sir, this language in no way prevents any adjustment that could be made in the future.

Mr. COLE. Except that it gives you authority to accept or reject any recommendation, whatever it may be, that the Quesada Board may make.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, Mr. Cole——

Mr. COLE. There is that big difference.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I want to promise you, I am not looking for any authority.

Mr. COLE. I know that.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We are just looking for the best security. And if that was in the bill, that part of it, I would be delighted to see it removed.

Mr. COLE. I didn't mean to intimate that you were. I am only speaking that it is from that standpoint that we must consider—at least myself—to what extent the words used in the act convey authority.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, the question that we would like to see held open, until this committee has had a chance to study and we had had this ad hoc committee report, is not so much the question of any authority in my view. It is the question of what is the best thing for the country, because when the National Guard problem came up in the Constitution it certainly didn't have any conception of an Air National Guard.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Secretary, then you do expect to hold this particular phase of the question in abeyance until this report comes out?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We already assured that to General Reckord, before his testimony of this week.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, Mr. Secretary, doesn't the issue boil down to this: Unless you amend the Unification Act you would have to have an Air National Guard because it provides that there?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Right, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you intend by agreement to try to warp the law into something that isn't there?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We know we have to go to Congress on this, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; but you have to face the problem whether or not you want to pry loose from the National Guard the air forces.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We never said we did want to pry loose the Air National Guard.

There has been talk, too much talk, about federalization. But I thought we had it agreed that we were going to have this ad hoc committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. No. The point is that in the law there is that authority and these men are picked out to carry it out. Now, you can't expect them to give if the law imposes a duty on them, without amending the law, can you?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We certainly haven't asked you to do anything illegal.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I know. But apparently I gathered from what both of you said that there are certain obstacles in the way of maintaining a good Air Force Reserve, and National Guard, and that the law the way it is drawn is one of the obstacles.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Now, what is the trouble in the way the law is drawn that you are referring to, sir?

Mr. JOHNSON. What I am referring to is that by that law they put under the jurisdiction of the National Guard the Air National Guard.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, but that doesn't read against this bill.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question——

Secretary SYMINGTON. It doesn't read against the language of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the issue, whether you want to take that out and have them under you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like to ask Mr. Secretary Symington what State control would remain over the Air National Guard if this legislation were to pass in present form?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Elston, I would like to go back to Mr. Johnson's question, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. All right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. The answer to that is there would be no change of any kind whatever.

Mr. ELSTON. Then perhaps the language in 201 might require some explanation. For example, it says:

* * * The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements, including tactical, administrative, logistic, air transport, and training, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized.

Digitized by Google

Just what does that language mean?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, first, we have in the bill the language for 61 Reserve groups. It does not break those groups down into exactly which should be National Guard or which should be Reserve.

I think that General Quesada, who also has a statement, if he read it on the question of the bill itself—he is the chairman of this ad hoc committee—might clarify some of the points that apparently are in your mind.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, let me ask you this: If the language remains as it is, couldn't the Secretary of the Air Force say that the National Guard could only have one group and the Reserve should have all the other groups?

Secretary SYMINGTON. The answer to that would be "No."

Mr. ELSTON. Well, what limitation is placed in the law?

Secretary SYMINGTON (addressing General Quesada). Would you like to comment on that?

General QUESADA. I have that in my talk and I will extract that portion of it from it.

Mr. ELSTON. I don't say you will try to do that. I don't want to intimate that for a moment.

General VANDENBERG. It is impossible for that to be done.

Mr. ELSTON. It could be done, couldn't it?

General VANDENBERG. No, sir.

General QUESADA. That is in my talk.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will it be possible for General Quesada to read his discussion of this bill, he being chairman of this committee?

I think, Mr. Elston, that point will be answered, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. All right.

General QUESADA. That will be answered.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead, General.

General QUESADA. My name is Quesada. E. R. are the initials.

STATEMENT BY LT. GEN. ELWOOD R. QUESADA, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

General QUESADA. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee:

I would like, with your permission, to eliminate some of the confusion which must be in the minds of us all as a result of proposals which have been interjected by representatives of the Reserve forces in their statements recommending certain amendments to H. R. 1437. I hope my explanation will enable us to isolate the intentions of section 201 of the proposed bill from the attendant confusion and to arrive at a mutual determination as to the propriety of those intentions. We have had prolonged discussions in which we have used the terms "United States Air Force," "Air Force of the United States," "Air National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia," "Air National Guard while in the Federal service," "Air National Guard of the United States," "Organized Reserve Corps," "Volunteer Reserve," and others. These together with the recitations of pertinent—and I might add confusing—statutes governing the authority for the organization and composition of complex and hazily defined components of our National Military Establishment leave me unable to arrive at any conclusion as to exactly what each of us had in mind.

It is difficult, for example, for me to determine which of the several definitions of the National Guard is applicable in a given instance, what the distinction is between the National Guard being "called" and "ordered" into the Federal service, and what patricular structure of the National Guard is affected when it is dormant as the National Guard of the several States, Territories and the District of Columbia,—or when it is dormant as the National Guard of the United States. I find this particularly complicated when both terms appear, to the best of my knowledge, to include identical personnel organized into identical units. Such confusion is certainly not compatible with the part to be played by the National Guard in existing war plans.

I am sure this confusion is responsible to a considerable degree for the decisions of the Secretaries of the Army and the Air Force to convene their committees to study problems pertaining to the Reserve forces. I feel equally sure that we all share in the hope that the deliberations of these committees will result in the preparation and enactment of legislation which once and for all will establish the structure of the Reserve forces best suited to meet the requirements of national defense.

As a result of the chairman's comments of Monday morning regarding confusion as to the difference between the United States Air Force and the Air Force of the United States, we have a proposed change to the language of the bill which we believe will assist in clarifying that point. The United States Air Force is the Regular Air Force while the Air Force of the United States consists of the Regular Air Force and all the reserve components. We believe the terminology of our suggested revision to be in line with Mr. Kilday's remarks on this subject and in accordance with the desire of all of us to make the wording of the proposed legislation as understandable as possible. We, therefore, suggest, in order to eliminate this portion of the confusion which has arisen, the first sentence of section 201 of the bill be deleted, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:

The Air Force of the United States shall have an authorized strength of 70 Regular Air Force groups, 22 separate regular Air Force squadrons and 61 Air Force Reserve groups, together with necessary supporting and auxiliary Regular and Reserve Air Force units.

I would like with your permission to set forth the attitude of the Department of the Air Force in respect to the wording "Air Force Reserve groups." This appears to be the main point of difference upon which I am qualified to speak. It is not our intention to eliminate the Air National Guard of the United States by the proposed legislation. Any accusation to the contrary is unjustified. We believe that the term "reserve" includes all components, individuals, and units of the Air Force of the United States now or hereafter established, which are not included in the Regular Air Force. The provisions of section V, of the act of June 15, 1933, Seventy-third Congress, which revised section 58 of the National Defense Act of 1916, indicate specifically that it was the intention of the Congress to include the National Guard of the United States as a component of the Reserve forces. With your permission I will quote the applicable text of this section:

> * * * The National Guard of the United States is hereby established. It shall be a reserve component of the Army of the United States and shall consist of (those) federally recognized National Guard units, and organizations, and of the officers, warrant officers, and enlisted members of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia * * *.

The application of this and other statutes pertaining to the National Guard was extended to the Air National Guard of the United States pursuant to the provisions of Transfer Order No. 10, Office of the Secretary of Defense, dated April 27, 1948. This transfer order was issued under the authority contained in the National Security Act of 1947, Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress.

In the course of the past few hearings of this committee it has been indicated that the provisions of section 201, as originally drafted, would offer an opportunity to destroy the Air National Guard of the United States. I deny that this contention has any basis in fact. The Air National Guard of the United States is now established by statutory laws with which H. R. 1437 is not in conflict. I submit that so long as it is the will of Congress that these laws remain in effect, it is not within the power of any appointed official to destroy the Air National Guard of the United States. As a point in case, may I cite the proviso to section 60 of the National Defense Act which, with respect to the National Guard, states, and I quote:

> Provided, That no change in allotment, branch, or arm of units or organizations wholly within a single State will be made without the approval of the governor of the State concerned.

It is not our understanding that H. R. 1437 will revoke section 60 of the National Defense Act.

In view of the attitude of the Department of the Air Force which I have just recited, it is our considered opinion that testimony before this committee as to the efficacy of the Air National Guard as a component of our Reserve forces is irrelevant to the proposed legislation. Neither do we believe that discussions as to the effectiveness or, as some would have it, the lack of effectiveness of other components of our Reserve forces have any bearing on this particular legislation.

A comparison has been drawn unfairly between the effectiveness of the Air National Guard and the effectiveness of the United States Air Force Reserve, suggesting that the National Guard's relative position is the result of its own efforts. May I liken this condition to that of a man having seven sons. This man spends 60 percent of his individual budget in providing education for one of them and 40 percent in providing education for the other six. In later years, the one receiving the bulk of the benefits persecutes his father for the neglect of the other six. However, the analogy is not complete unless the committee is made aware of the fact that the Air National Guard has been given all the tactical aircraft, thereby leaving none for the Air Reserves. The value of these aircraft is not reflected in the budget figures since they were made available by the Air Force without cost to National Guard appropriations except for the cost of removing some of them from storage.

85266—49—No. 12——13

At the present time there are a total of 5,382 officers in the Air National Guard, while there are 232,903 officers enrolled for training in the Air Reserves, or a ratio of Reserve officers to Guard officers of more than 42 to 1. These comparisons would not support the accusations that the Department of the Air Force is trying to destroy the Air National Guard.

We do know, in the light of existing and foreseeable international conditions, that we require for purposes of military security an Air Force of the United States composed of such Regular units as are incorporated in the terms of the proposed legislation, augmented by 61 groups of Reserve forces.

By direction of the Secretary of Defense, and with the approval of the President, the Department of the Air Force is now engaged in studies to determine the size, organization, and structural composition of the Reserve forces which will most effectively insure our national military security with the most economical expenditure of appropriated funds. When these studies have been completed we will present for consideration by the Congress our recommendations as to legislation which we believe necessary to authorize the proposed structure.

We believe that any determination of the relative strengths and composition of specified components of our Reserve forces in H. R. 1437 not only would serve no useful purpose, but also would prejudice acceptance of any other proposed structure which we might later submit to the Congress as a result of our current studies.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, General.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, my question has not been answered. If the Chairman will indulge me a moment, I would like to ask the general another question or two.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Go right ahead.

Mr. ELSTON. You point out, for example, that section 60 of the National Defense Act states that no change in allotment, branch, or arm of units or organizations wholly within a single State will be made without the approval of the Governor of the State concerned. The point I am making is that this legislation does not fix the number of units.

I agree that section 60 would preclude a change in the allotment once the allotment was made, but I think the point that is being made here is that this legislation does not fix any allotment so far as the National Guard Air Force is concerned. In other words, you don't indicate how many groups shall be alloted to the National Guard.

General QUESADA. We don't intend to.

Mr. ELSTON. You simply say 61 for the Reserve forces. Now, the way the act is drawn wouldn't that permit the Secretary of the Air Force to designate how many should be assigned to the National Guard and how many should be assigned to the Reserves, generally; and couldn't he say, for example, one unit or one group, in the National Guard and all the rest to the Reserves? I am not saying he would, but he could do it in view of the way this section is drawn, could he not?

General QUESADA. At the present time he couldn't because the units that are in existence could not be changed except under the provisions that I have cited.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Elston, we could withdraw——

Mr. ELSTON. There is no law——

Secretary SYMINGTON. We could withdraw Federal recognition now if we didn't think they were up to standard.

Mr. ELSTON. That is another question, Mr. Secretary: Federal recognition. But at the present time have any National Guard units been fixed by law?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I don't think they have.

This, however—the way it is written—would give an organization with just over 5,000 officers, 35 groups, and an organization with 232,000 officers in the Reserve, how many groups?

General QUESADA. Twenty-seven.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Twenty-seven.

Mr. ELSTON. But none for the National Guard. This law does not fix any particular——

Secretary SYMINGTON. If the suggestion of yesterday was adopted with respect to the number of groups, giving 35 to the National Guard, we who have an interest in the development of the civilian components would then by law be forced to put 35 groups into 5,000-plus officers and 27 groups into 232,000-plus officers, plus a great many thousand more who would sign up if they thought there was any chance to get a flight.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, if the law is written that way it would do it, of course; but the way it is written now it wouldn't do it, would it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir, as I see it.

Mr. KILDAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. If I remember correctly—I would like to have General Reckord's attention—when General Bradley was here, section 102 of the bill had a provision with reference to the allocation of National Guard units of the Army by the President, to which you objected.

General RECKORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And by agreement that was eliminated.

General RECKORD. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. My recollection is that at that time General Reckord took the position that even though the National Guard units of the Army were not assigned by law, but having been federally recognized in the various States, they could not be disturbed without the permission of the governor. Isn't that correct?

General RECKORD. Mr. Kilday——

Mr. KILDAY. Under section 60.

General RECKORD. Section 60 has a proviso to this effect——

Mr. KILDAY. We have been over that, General. That is the one where the units cannot be disturbed.

General RECKORD. The answer——

Mr. KILDAY. Now, the basic law of the Army National Guard is no more specific in the assignment of individual units than the proposal for the Air Force contained in this bill, is it?

General RECKORD. I don't quite get the point.

Mr. KILDAY. There is nothing in the law specifically assigning Army National Guard units to States.

General RECKORD. No, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. But having been assigned, and having been federally recognized, they are regarded as being protected by section 60 of the National Defense Act and they cannot be withdrawn nor disturbed without the permission of the governor of the State.

General RECKORD. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, the 27 air groups—the 26 which have been federally recognized, having been federally recognized after allocation to the State could not under section 60 of the National Defense Act be reallocated without the permission of the governor of the State within which the unit is located.

General RECKORD. That is correct at the present time.

Mr. KILDAY. So that the fear that the gentleman from Ohio has, that under a blanket authorization of 61 groups the National Guard might be given 1 and the Reserve 60 is not justified under the law, is it?

General RECKORD. That is not justified under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. And could not happen.

Mr. ELSTON. The point I am making is this: This act might be interpreted as a repeal or a modification of section 60 of the National Defense Act.

Mr. KILDAY. Does the gentleman yield to me further?

As I understood from the testimony of both the Secretary and General Quesada, they take the position that section 60 does protect these National Guard units.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And that in addition there is no purpose or intention on the part of the Department of Air to disturb these 26 units.

Now, I want to ask this: Would there be any objection on the part of the Department of the Air Force, in view of the position you have taken, and the interpretation of the law, to including in this bill a proviso to the effect that nothing contained in this bill shall be construed to confer upon the Department or the Secretary the power to federalize the existing National Guard groups?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We would be entirely satisfied with that.

Mr. KILDAY. Why doesn't that settle our problem?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We would be entirely satisfied with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then we go one step further. There would be no harm in writing into the bill the 26 which have already been established.

Mr. KILDAY. A proviso as to existing units.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. That would leave it, then, so that whatever the recommendation of the Gray board is would have to be the subject of specific and special legislation before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank Mr. Kilday for the clarity with which he has put the point. We are not lawyers, any of us, here from the Air Force. His suggestion is entirely satisfactory to us.

But our point is, sir, as you can see by the figures we have given with respect to relative strength, there might come a time when we would want to put in more groups of a Reserve-type and there might come times when we would want to put in more groups of the National Guard type. When you come to a bill which is an authorization bill it doesn't seem essential to specify the differences between those two groups, because when the legislation will come up as a result of your investigation—that is the committee's—and our ad hoc committee, you can then decide what you think is the best way to handle it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, your thought would be to put in the bill that nothing in here can be construed as a federalization of the guard, and leave out the number of units for both components.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. That would serve the purpose of maintaining the status quo.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And not hold up the authorization of our Regular Air Force and our Army and National Guard of the Army.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it would also have the effect of making it positive in the language that we do have an Air Force composed of three component parts.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Regular, the National Guard, and the Reserve.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From the language that the General just read, it is done by interpretation because there is nowhere in that law mention of the Air National Guard. You just do it under the authority of transferring.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is all right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General Reckord, what have you to say in regard to that? We are trying to work you all together here.

General RECKORD. The only thing I would like to say—and I don't want to be considered as doing anything but protecting our position because certain things have been said to me which I don't like, and more or less in a threatening manner—I think the committee in the light of this discussion should know what the facts are.

We are as much interested as any other group in the national defense. That comes first.

The reason we are trying to protect the Air National Guard is because we know we have given more for the dollars spent in the Air National Guard than any other group has given, dollar for dollar.

These figures which the Secretary has given you can be shot all to pieces. This statement of General Quesada's is like a sieve to me.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, let us not engage in incriminations. Let us try to get together.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General, if this bill is so written that the Air Force shall consist of the Regular Air Force, Air National Guard, and Air Reserve, and that nothing in this bill can be construed to mean that it is the intent of Congress for federalization of the Air Guard, which has the effect of having everything in status quo—we will cross the Gray board report later—what objection would you have to that?

General RECKORD. We have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Whitney, do you desire to make any comment? I think we worked everything out here.

85266—49—No. 12——14

Secretary WHITNEY. I believe, sir, I have nothing to add in view of everything that has been said.

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Mr. Secretary Symington one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead.

Mr. TOWE. In section 201 of this proposed legislation, beginning in the second sentence, it reads as follows: "The Air Force of the United States," and so forth, shall consist of this, and then these words are here, "as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force consistent with the numbers of personnel and aircraft hereinafter authorized."

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Towe, what section is that, sir?

Mr. TOWE. Section 201.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWE. I assume we are going to leave in the authority which is stated in that sentence. When the Secretary was asked by the chairman whether he would agree to have the specific number of units included in the bill, he said "Yes." Then he added—and I want to be corrected on this if I have misinterpreted your additional remarks—that there had to be some leeway. And I assume that that is the reason for that provision in the bill.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, Mr. Towe, if we could we would like to have a bill that didn't limit what we wanted to do in the future, provided the committee approved it. This is an authorization bill. We would like to have it general.

Mr. TOWE. I understand.

Secretary SYMINGTON. For example, sir, we have more Air Reserve officers in your part of the country than we have Air National Guard in the total United States.

Mr. TOWE. That is right, but they are not organized.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.

Mr. TOWE. They are not organized.

Seretary SYMINGTON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary, and General Reckord—

Secretary SYMINGTON. I beg your your pardon—excuse me, sir—they are organized. Nor am I counting the additional ones who would like to be in.

Mr. TOWE. My question hasn't been answered, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, pardon me. Can you answer the gentleman's question?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I am trying to answer it.

If this is an authorization bill, and with the definite proviso that we don't imply federalization, as Mr. Kilday mentioned, we would like to see in the authorization bill some leeway with respect to how the Reserve civilian components are set up.

Mr. TOWE. So that the authority you have under that provision would permit you, if it is going to be of any value, to change to some extent the set-up in the bill as to units?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, didn't we go over that in respect to the law and the position of the States? Mr. Elston made the point.

Mr. TOWE. Yes, we went over it. And that is why I am asking you the question. I don't quite understand why you need to have that authority, if we are going to fix the components in the bill. I would like you to tell us why, if you can.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I thought we weren't going to fix the components.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me see if I can understand everything——

Mr. TOWE. I understood a moment ago that you are going to include in the bill the units they now have.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the law does that. Section 60 of the National Defense Act fixes it so that these having been established—these 27—cannot be taken away from the States except by the consent of the governor. Then, if we go one step further and say that nothing in this bill repeals that, that absolutely makes sure that the National Guard Air Force, as established today will remain unless the governors knock them loose.

Then you could go one step further and say that nothing in this bill shall be construed to be interpreted as a federalization of the National Guard.

Then you would be saying that the Air Force is composed of three component parts: The Regular United States Air Force—and I think it would be proper to say 70 groups there—the Air National Guard and the Air Reserve. Now, is that, General, satisfactory to you?

General RECKORD. That would be most satisfactory to us, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that satisfactory to you, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. General Vandenberg, that is satisfactory to you?

General VANDENBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Whitney?

Secretary WHITNEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, is it satisfactory to the committee to have our staff, and the representatives of the Air Department and the General to sit down and write up this amendment? If so, then we will be ready to pass this bill and get through with it.

Now, I think this: It is highly important that we go to the floor as early as possible with some organization. Now, you are accomplishing this. You are putting in the statute definitely that the Air National Guard is a part. You are establishing it. You are establishing the Air Force Reserve as a part. You are establishing that the Regular United States Air Force shall consist of 70 groups. And all those things constitute the broad words "The Air Force of the United States."

Now, it is highly important that we try to get this bill before the appropriation bill comes in, because then it strengthens us in our fight for a 70 air group. Congress, having already authorized it in 1 month shouldn't repudiate it the next month by not making as much money available as needed.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, you left out one element.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. KILDAY. We will continue in section 201 the present language "supplemented by 61 Air Force reserve"—with a small "r"—"groups"?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman——

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Sixty-one.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, that leaves to the Department—his hands are tied with 26 now——

Secretary SYMINGTON. Twenty-seven, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-seven.

You are tied down with 27, fixed by section 60, which we will reaffirm in this law. It ought to be reaffirmed. Have you any objection to reaffirming it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well——

The CHAIRMAN. We are putting here that nothing can be construed to abrogate or repeal section 60 of the National Defense Act.

Secretary SYMINGTON. It is all right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is all right?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General Evans, do you agree to this?

General EVANS. Generally, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That ends it. No need to debate it.

General EVANS. I want to qualify it, Mr. Chairman, I will take a page out of the book of our National Guard friends. I am assuming, of course, that it will not be all National Guard, that we will have our own share of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if he has $73,000,000, as one member of this committee I am going to see that it is spent. There is no need to have the money and the Reserve on paper. They must do something about it.

General EVANS. We need much more than the $73,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you go to the Appropriations Committee and get that.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, there is one more point on 201, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. General McConnell, who is our expert on this whole subject, has a point or two.

General MCCONNELL. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the point about which Mr. Towe asked awhile ago, Mr. Towe said, referring to section 201, the wording:

> The Air Force of the United States is authorized to consist of the number of organizational units—

and so forth—

> as may be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force—

he was disturbed as to whether or not that would authorize the Secretary to make any changes in the specified number of 70 and 61.

That wording does not refer to any numbers as specified by 70 or 61 groups. It refers to the numbers of squadrons which you have to have in groups: To depot units, depot groups, air service groups, headquarters units, and headquarters squadrons, aircraft control and warning units, and installations of that type.

Mr. TOWE. You misunderstood me, sir. I was not disturbed about what you said I was disturbed about.

General MCCONNELL. Does that answer your question, sir?

Mr. TOWE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Secretary——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. We are agreed on this.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are going to come back with a plan, then. That will mean they are going to ask for an amendment to this authorization law. When your commitee gets through mulling this all over——

The CHAIRMAN. No. Let everybody understand it. They will come in here with a proposal this way: The Air Force of the United States has three legs that it stands on——

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Then they will put in there about section 60 of the National Defense Act. Then they will put in there that it can't be construed that we are federalizing the Air National Guard. That is all there will be in the proposal.

Mr. KILDAY. I think what the gentleman from California is referring to: If there is any proposal on the report of the Gray Board. Isn't that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a separate proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. And you will have a separate hearing on it.

Mr. JOHNSON. No: that isn't entirely the whole thing. They want to readjust this. And maybe they should. I can see that the Air National Guard is an entirely different problem than the National Guard—entirely different—and maybe they should be taken out of the National Guard. I think that, maybe now, because it grew out of the fact that they were supporting groups to the Army. That is how it was developed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the issue before us today.

Mr. JOHNSON. When this committee comes up with something there, it has to go in the statute. You can't sit over in the Pentagon and make a lot of agreements that warp all your statutes to pieces. You have nothing to build on. We are trying to get a structure on which to build.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what we are trying to do. We all agreed on section 201.

Now, as to the next section, there is no dispute about 502,000 men?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir.

Now, the thought runs through my mind whether we should break you down and say 75,000 officers, or whether we should leave it—like we fixed in the Army Department—for you to determine how many officers you need. Now, which do you want?

My thought is this, and I will give you the benefit of it: Of course, in the Navy law we have a provision by which we say how many officers there may be. But I don't think in the Army, in view of their different assignments, and in view of their composition, it would be wise to restrict them. The same thing applies to the Air Force. I don't think it would be wise to say you could only have 75,000 officers. Of course, if you have more officers than you are entitled to you would be criticized about it.

Now, you know how to formulate these things. Why wouldn't it be wise to say that your strength is composed of 502,000 officers and enlisted men and let you, from a military standpoint, determine how many officers you need?

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, General Vandenberg would like General Edwards to comment on that.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General EDWARDS. I will say first that the 75,000 figure was very carefully worked out by studying the basic units which go altogether to make up the Air Force. It isn't so necessary to have the total officer figure of 75,000 officers and warrant officers as it is to have an established authority for Regular officers of 35,000.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General EDWARDS. That is the important authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, put it 502,000 officers and enlisted men, of which 35,000 shall be Regulars.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I wouldn't break it down any further.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, on that point we have a very complicated question, I am afraid, General, under our promotion bill.

Of course, I understood your testimony here the other day that if you got the authorization of 35,000 it would not be the purpose of the Department to immediately upgrade but might reach it by 1960. But in legislating we must look to what could be done.

Now, of course, our promotion bill provides the percentages of grades by your authorized strength and not your actual strength.

General EDWARDS. That is right; yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. So, in that you differ from the Navy, because their promotion list is determined by the on-board strength and yours by the authorized strength.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir; plus such temporary promotions that the act permits us to make from time to time.

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

You differentiated between the 35,000 Regulars and the others. I am sure you had in mind the question of the promotions which can take place under the authorized strength.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday, the full question is whether we shall break it down or whether we shall give them authority.

Mr. KILDAY. We must break it down or else we must go back and amend the Promotion Act. There is no other way we can handle it.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't see that if you said "of which number 35,000 shall be regulars," how that interferes.

Mr. KILDAY. Yes, but the promotions are based on the Regulars.

General EDWARDS. The current promotions in the Air Force, like in the Army, are governed by the authorized Regular officer strength of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, do you want it broken down like it is in the bill?

General EDWARDS. That was our original thought.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, then it is different than the way we did it for the Army. Is that satisfactory?

General EDWARDS. I don't know how the Army did it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Army didn't break it down.

General EDWARDS. We would like it broken down.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. You want yours to read a personnel strength of 502,000, which number shall include not to exceed 75,300 officers, including warrant officers, of which number 35,000 may be Regular Air Force officers and 4,800 may be Regular Air Force warrant officers, and 426,700 enlisted men.

General EDWARDS. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, we are going too fast on this problem. It is much more important than I am afraid the chairman realizes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. KILDAY. What is your present Regular officer strength, since the division with the Army?

General EDWARDS. Twenty thousand four hundred, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. You are now going to 35,000?

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, tell me roughly how many more colonels that would permit you to have than your present authorization, roughly?

General EDWARDS. It would permit us to have, eventually, in 10 years, when we got to that strength, 8 percent of 35,000, roughly.

Mr. KILDAY. Instead of 8 percent of 20,000?

General EDWARDS. Instead of 8 percent of 20,000.

Mr. KILDAY. It would be 2,800 against 1,600.

General EDWARDS. But what it would mean is this: It would merely transfer a Reserve for a civilian components colonel into a Regular colonel.

Mr. KILDAY. How are you going to do that?

General EDWARDS. Over a period of time. It would take time to do it.

Mr. KILDAY. But your integration law has expired.

General EDWARDS. We can't do that as to individuals, but the number.

Mr. KILDAY. I do want the committee to understand that when we raised the Regular authorized strength of the officer corps of the Air Force we automatically raised the numbers in each grade.

General EDWARDS. That are authorized; yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Under our promotion law.

Mr. NORBLAD. Will the gentleman yield, please? Could I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORBLAD. In other words, if this law is passed you could immediately, not on a 10-year basis, but under the law you could immediately increase your number of colonels and generals by, oh, say, half again as many without increasing the strength of your men?

General EDWARDS. That is right, I think we could, subject to the check of annual appropriations.

Mr. NORBLAD. That is right. But you wouldn't have to wait for any 10 years. You could do it overnight.

General EDWARDS. That is right, we could.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, the language in reference to the personnel strength is what you want, which is in the bill?

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir; we would prefer that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is active duty, you know.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could I ask one question there, just to supplement what Mr. Norblad said?

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. It means the promotion rate for permanent grades would be about twice as fast.

General EDWARDS. No; it wouldn't be any different because we don't intend or couldn't get the 35,000 Regular officers except over a period of 10 years. We don't have the sources available to us to get those Regular officers.

Mr. JOHNSON. In other words, you are only limited by that.

General EDWARDS. That is the real limitation; yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I can't yet see how that is. It seems to me it would just double the rate of increase in promotions for the Regular officers.

Mr. NORBLAD. Now in the service.

Mr. JOHNSON. Instead of applying——

General EDWARDS. Well, administratively, it would be possible to do it. But we would have to defend that before the Appropriations Committee, and we wouldn't have a chance of getting it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, that may be true, but isn't this the net effect of it: Instead of applying it to about 75,000, the promotion system for the Regulars is applied to only 35,000?

General EDWARDS. That is right, for permanent promotions; yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are pyramiding it on top of this great group of 502,000 men and officers.

General EDWARDS. That is right.

Mr. NORBLAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORBLAD. In other words, if you have 500 colonels, right now if this law were passed, you could immediately increase the number of colonels to 800 or 900 under the law.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir; that is correct. However, we do not anticipate filling officer grades based on a percentage of authorized strength but intend rather to fill grades based on actual strength.

Mr. NORBLAD. I am just giving this figure as an example. How would it actually work out on colonels.

General EDWARDS. We have an authorization for 1,600 colonels now and if this law is passed the authorization would be increased to about 2,800.

Mr. NORBLAD. This ratio of increase would be the same as to all other officer grades?

General EDWARDS. Colonel and below, yes. This would not affect generals as there is a definite limitation placed on them by Public Law 381, Eigthieth Congress. The Army and Air Force combined may not have more than 357; currently we are authorized 150 of this number.

Mr. JOHNSON. Won't that have a damaging effect on the morale of the men that are in on temporary duty; that is, Reserve officers?

General EDWARDS. No, sir; because they are being promoted themselves.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well——

General EDWARDS. A fair share of our promotions, a very fair share of our promotions go to Reserve officers that are on active duty.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is not a reflection on anybody in the Air Force.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. JOHNSON. I just want to wind out what the facts are, General. I have great confidence in you personally. But pretty nearly every Reserve officer I have talked to—and they are around the captain and major grades—claim they are bypassed by members of the Regular Establishment.

General EDWARDS. I don't think that is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. They keep talkingto me about it, and I just say I can't do anything about it. You shouldn't do something to destroy the morale of those 35,000 men that are coming in from civil life to help you out.

General EDWARDS. I would welcome giving you the facts on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Clemente, any objections?

Mr. CLEMENTE. Yes. I want to try to pursue the same line of thought of Mr. Kilday, when he spoke about 8 percent colonels. Would that in any way afford an opportunity for a Reserve officer to become a colonel in the next 10 years, General?

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir. We have many Reserve officers who are on active duty today as colonels.

Mr. CLEMENTE. I don't mean now, but in the future.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir. We just made——

Mr. CLEMENTE. The number of colonels is usually 1.7 to the general total strength; is that right?

General EWARDS. I didn't understand.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Isn't the number used by the Army 1.7 for colonels?

General EDWARDS. I have the figures on what the over-all percentage is in the Air Force.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Isn't that all used up now for colonels?

General EDWARDS. No. We just promoted 60 Reserve officers to the grade of colonel, in December.

Mr. CLEMENTE. How about now and the 10-year period that you are talking about?

General EDWARDS. That applies only to Regular officers. We were increased to this 35,000 figure by 1960.

Mr. CLEMENTE. That is all I wanted to know.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General Edwards I wanto clear that up. Section 202 says:

> The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized an active-duty personnel strength of 502,000, which number shall include not to exceed 75,300 officers.

Then you would leave out the 75,000. You would put in there 35,000 Regular Air Force officers, 4,800 Regular Air Force warrant officers, and 426,700 enlisted personnel.

General EDWARDS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Because you wouldn't want to put the figure 75,000, as this is the active-duty strength; is that correct now?

General EDWARDS. That is right, both Regular and Reserve active-duty strength.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there would be 35,000 Regular Air Force officers and 4,800 Regular Air Force warrant officers?

General EDWARDS. If you put the officers in and the warrant officers and the total strength, the balance necessarily would be enlisted.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Digitized by Google

General EDWARDS. But I do think it would make it clearer to spell it out.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General EDWARDS. All three categories.

Mr. KILDAY. If we don't keep the 75,000 figure in the bill the Air Corps conceivably could have 100,000, couldn't they? There would be no limitation?

General EDWARDS. That is right.

For instance, if there was only the 502,000 limitation, you could convert enlisted spaces into officer spaces.

The CHAIRMAN. This is active duty.

Mr. KILDAY. Yes; but the 75,000 is a brake on the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. No; this is active duty.

I think it ought to be left out. I think we ought to try to get it as close to the language of the Army——

General EDWARDS. It would give the Department more latitude, more leeway, if it were left in there.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, what have you to say in regard to the strength of the National Guard being fixed for personnel at not exceeding 100,000?

Secretary SYMINGTON. What is the strength of the National Guard today?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the strength, General?

General RECKORD. The authorized strength for this fiscal year, 41,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-one thousand.

General RECKORD. We expect it to go to 56,000 within the next 2 years.

The CHAIRMAN. You see, we have done the same thing in the Army bill. We put the strength of the National Guard in the section dealing with the Army, and we put the strength of the Reserve in people. Now, why wouldn't it be in the same line of reasoning today—not exceeding 100,000? That is a latitude which you would never probably get to, because your National Guard and appropriations may not give you enough money. But they wouldn't have to come up, if the emergency arose, and have to have it changed. And the National Guard is such a part of your scheme of national defense that with an over-all ceiling of 100,000 it can't hurt the situation at all.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure this morning to agree with my good friend, General Reckord, on this problem.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, this is very important. Mr. Secretary, what have you to say in regard to putting in here for the Air Force Reserve a personnel strength of 235,000? Of course, you are never going to get it, but it is generous and there is no harm in it.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Fine, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, any questions from the staff to clarify anything?

Mr. HARLOW. Well, sir, I believe they have in the draft of the bill proposed by the Air Force 256,100 officers for the Reserve, instead of 235,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, General Evans didn't want but 235,000 yesterday. If that is all they want, put 235,000——

Digitized by Google

General EVANS. No, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Put in 265,000 and let us have no debate about that.

General EVANS. We have more than that now, Mr. Chairman. We have 234,000 officers and we have 187,000 enlisted men.

The CHAIRMAN. You said yesterday 235,000.

General EVANS. I beg your pardon. That was officers.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what this is: Officers, 235,000.

Mr. BLANDFORD. It includes everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, make it 400,000.

General EVANS. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, does that get everything straightened out? All right, now, let us take section 203:

The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized 24,000 serviceable aircraft to fulfill the requirements for aircraft necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, which aircraft shall be so allocated so as to provide and maintain 70 Regular Air Force groups and 22 separate Regular Air Force squadrons in the United States Air Force, 35 Air National Guard groups in the Air National Guard of the United States and 27 Air Force Reserve groups * * *.

Now, do you want those figures in there now?

General VANDENBERG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't want those figures in there because you have 27 and that 27 will have to come out of the 24,000. They wouldn't have to go in there, would they, General?

General VANDENBERG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. General Reckord?

General RECKORD. Mr. Chairman, the only point we made on this section was the fact that there is a total number of planes authorized. I asked the question as to whether that was for the Regular Establishment only, or whether or not it included the National Guard and the Reserve. If that point is clear, that is all we want.

The CHAIRMAN. Well——

Secretary SYMINGTON. I could answer that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. It does include the planes for the National Guard and the Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right; the 24,000 includes everybody.

Mr. KILDAY. How about your air-frame pounds in there?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We asked for that at the last hearing.

Mr. KILDAY. This doesn't include it. What is your total?

Secretary SYMINGTON. 225,000 tons, which is 450,000,000 pounds of airplane weight. We would like to include that in there, Mr. Chairman. I mentioned that to you last time, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You want to put that in?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir; if we could we would like that.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, put both in—24,000 and the poundage; is that correct?

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is correct; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, I suggest this, members of the committee: I suggest that our staff—we are fortunte to have a very able staff—and that General Vandenberg and that General Reckord, and any other ones in the Department who are concerned, sit down and fix this bill up and have it ready for the committee in the morning because we want to vote on it tomorrow——

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Digitized by Google

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Wait one minute. Have that ready and we will vote on it Monday morning.

And immediately after we vote on this bill we want to commence a hearing on the bill introduced yesterday by Mr. Short on behalf of the committee to establish the Office of Under Secretary in the Department of National Defense.

Now, we have to begin to make time because we have a heap of work piling up on us. So you gentlemen try to get everything ready for Monday morning, to vote on this bill.

Now, Mr. Gavin.

Mr. GAVIN. I was wondering: We spent hours here in a discussion of this problem and here is a National Guardman that says:

High-level group to restudy troop basis. A new special group representing the National Guard, Organized Reserve, the Regular Army, and the public generally has been created by the Army Secretary Kenneth F. Royall to re-examine the Guard-Reserve postwar troop basis.

Now, here it states:

The announced reason for establishing the committee was to determine whether the size and distribution of the Army civilian components are adequate and practical in the light of the present national defense needs.

Now, if this group is going to study this question—we are studying it here—I just wondered what you are going to do when this report comes in?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the committee that the Secretary appointed to work out this proposition with the National Guard has had its work done here. It has already been worked out here in a half hour, for which they were going to take 6 weeks to work out. We got them all together. We can get these others together. We will just sit down here and cut out all the frills and furbelows.

We will take a recess until Monday morning. And have this ready now. We are going to vote Monday morning.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Thank you, sir.

(Whereupon, at 11:51 a. m., the committee adjourned.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Tuesday, February 8, 1949.

(The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.)

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

I want to ask the clerk now, with reference to the hearings, have the Department witnesses all finished correcting the hearings and are all of them back?

Mr. HARPER. I suggest Mr. Blandford——

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes; we have all of the testimony back and as soon as today's testimony is in my hands and corrected it will be able to go to the printers, probably tomorrow afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, we will be able to have the hearings on the floor when the bill is considered?

Mr. BLANDFORD. If we can get the hearings back by the day after: yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, under the rules, members of the committee, no bill can be reported out until the hearings have been available for 3 days.

Now, does the committee want to insist on that? If so, we cannot vote on this bill today and we will have to wait until the hearings come in.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill was heard by the whole committee. I do not believe that the rule should be adhered to in a case of this kind too strongly, where it was not heard by a subcommittee by but the full committee.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you say, Mr. Cole?

Mr. COLE. As a matter of fact, it was my recollection—in fact, I know the purpose of the rule was that it related only to reports from subcommittees.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. COLE. And not to measures heard by the full committee.

Mr. KILDAY. I think that is the intent of it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, members of the committee, laying before you is an amendment that has been submitted as a committee print. On Saturday the Policy Committee——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, before you leave that subject and so long as it has arisen here for the first time, in order that we may have a clear understanding on this point, let me read the rule. It is No. 9 and it says:

> Reports and recommendations of a subcommittee shall not be considered by the full committee until after the intervention of three calendar days from the time the report is submitted and printed hearings thereon are available to the members, except that this rule may be waived by a two-thirds vote of a quorum of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that does not apply.

Mr. COLE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad to konw that.

Now, as I started to remark, there is a committee print in the nature of a substitute to the language of the bill H. R. 1437. On Saturday the Policy Committee—Mr. Kilday, Mr. Arends, Mr. Cole, Mr. Short, and myself, had a meeting. Mr. Brooks was unavoidably out of the city, and so was Mr. Durham. We had a discussion with the Department heads—Mr. Secretary Symington and General Dahlquist—with reference to what was disturbing some of us. We didn't think the facts justified 40,000 Regular officers.

After considering it and talking around the table we decided the facts did justify a Regular Establishment of 33,500 officers. And we did think that the facts warranted an increase of warrant officers to 9,000 from 40-some-odd hundred. And with reference to the Air Force we thought the number of officers in their Regular Establishment should be fixed at 27,500. So we corrected the bill along those lines and it is now before the committee for consideration.

Therefore, I am offering to move to strike out all after the enacting clause of H. R. 1437 and offer as an amendment the committee print No. 2 which is now before you.

Digitized by Google

Now, Mr. Blandford, will you proceed to read the committee print for consideration? And it is open to amendment by any member of the committee.

Mr. BLANDFORD. All right, sir——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I think it might be well for you to explain how the figures of 33,500 for the Army and 27,500 for the Air Force was determined.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

We arrived at it this way—we didn't pick it out of the air, but we tried to be mathematically certain—under the proposed bill the strength of the Army is fixed at 837,000. That is an over-all ceiling. Today they have 682,000 men in the service, approximately. The budget has reduced that where they will have an Army on active duty of 677,000.

The Army calculates that at least 10 percent should be officers, so that would create an officer strength for the Regular Army—all bear in mind I am talking about the Regulars now—sixty-seven thousand-and-some-odd-hundred Regular officers.

Mr. COLE. No; active-duty officers.

The CHAIRMAN. Active-duty officers.

Their plan is to have one-half of their officer strength coming from Reserve and one-half from the Regulars. So we figured, if that be their method, then 33,500 would be the number of Regular officers. In that way we arrived at the figures.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, that becomes important because of the promotion bill. The distribution in rank is based on authorized strength, rather than actual strength.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. And I am happy to say that the departments, while they may not exactly like it, were willing to go along. Is that correct, Mr. Secretary Symington?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. I am in the same position, Mr. Chairman. I don't like it, but I will go along with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that correct, General Dahlquist?

General DALHQUIST. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. That is for the Air, since you asked Mr. Symington?

The CHAIRMAN. For the Air we reach the same kind of basis. We probably might have been a little bit more generous with the Air because they wanted 35,000 and we reached a figure of 27,500, but we tried to reach it along that same kind of basis.

Now, I want to get this from you two gentlemen: When you go to the Senate are you supporting this bill or are you trying to rewrite the bill on a different figure? I do that for this reason: Oftentimes this committee has worked very hard in the past and then when they would go over to the Senate they would start the old fight over again. Now where do we stand? Are you going to support this bill or are you going to try to write a new bill?

What do you say, Mr. Symington?

Secretary SYMINGTON. We are going to support this bill, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. General, what do you say?

General DAHLQUIST. We will support it.

The CHAIRMAN. That winds it up.

Now read the bill.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

A BILL To authorize the composition of the Army of the United States and the Air Force of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. That this Act may be cited as the "Army and Air Force Act of 1949."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. In enacting this legislation, it is the intent of Congress to provide an Army of the United States and an Air Force of the United States capable, in conjunction with the other armed services, of preserving the peace, security, and providing for the defense of the United States, its Territories, possessions, and occupied areas wherever located, of supporting the national policies of implementing the national objectives, and of overcoming any nations responsible for aggressive acts imperiling the peace and security of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. One minute now.

Any objection to the preamble or the objective of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did you consider whether or not it would be advisable to write two separate bills, so that in the event of amendment you just amend the particular bill concerned?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Department desires to have it written as one bill, with the two titles.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Is it all right if we sit up here? We can't hear very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. General, you come up here with the Secretary, and you gentlemen come around to the table.

Now, title I, for the Army.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

TITLE I—ARMY

AUTHORIZED COMPOSITION

SEC. 101. The organized peace establishment of the Army of the United States, including the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, and the Organized Reserve Corps, shall include all of those divisions and other military organizations, with their installations, and supporting and auxiliary elements, including combat, training, administrative, and logistic, and all personnel, including those not assigned to units, necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. Now——

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Mr. Harlow.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman, in line 12 there, after the words "United States," there should be inserted the terms "the National Guard while in the service of the United States," to make this section conform to the National Defense Act and also to section 201 of this bill relating to the Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see. Well, this is something that was left out.

Mr. HARLOW. Inadvertently omitted from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The organized peace establishment of the Army of the United States, including the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, and what other branch of the National Guard?

Mr. HARLOW. The National Guard while in the service of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, without objection, then, that will be put in.

Any comment with reference to section 101? If not, read section 102.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

AUTHORIZED PERSONNEL STRENGTH

SEC. 102. (a) There is hereby authorized for the Army of the United States an active duty personnel strength of eight hundred and thirty-seven thousand officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, exclusive of such one-year enlistees as are or may be authorized by law, officer candidates, personnel of the reserve components on active duty for training purposes only, persons paid under the appropriations for the National Guard and Organized Reserve Corps, and personnel and units of the reserve components ordered to active duty in an emergency hereafter declared.

(b) Of the active duty personnel strength authorized in subsection (a) of this section, not to exceed thirty-three thousand five hundred may be active list commissioned officers of the Regular Army, exclusive of the numbers authorized by law for the Army Nurse Corps and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, and nine thousand may be active list warrant officers of the Regular Army. Section 501 of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 883) is hereby amended by striking out the words "fifty-one thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty-three thousand five hundred"; and hereafter the active list commissioned officer strength authorized in said section shall apply to the Regular Army, exclusive of the United States Air Force.

(c) There is hereby authorized for the National Guard and the National Guard of the United States a personnel strength, to be distributed among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, of seven hundred and fifty thousand officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States who are counted within the personnel strength of eight hundred and thirty-seven thousand authorized in subsection (a) of this section.

(d) There is hereby authorized for the Organized Reserve Corps a personnel strength of nine hundred and eighty thousand officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, excluding those serving on active duty in the Army of the United States who are counted within the personnel strength of eight hundred and thirty-seven thousand authorized in subsection (a) of this section. Persons may be appointed as warrant officers in the Officers Reserve Corps under such regulations and in such numbers as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. Any amendments to section 102 from any members of the committee?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, let me ask for information if there is any provision in law with respect to the number of officers in the National Guard?

The CHAIRMAN. General, can you answer Mr. Cole's question?

General RECKORD. No, Mr. Cole, there is not. It is governed by table of organization and authorization given through the Bureau to the several States by the Department.

Mr. COLE. Was there any feeling in the National Guard that there should be some statutory provision with respect to the number of officers out of the total authorized National Guard strength?

General RECKORD. I think not, Mr. Cole.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Now, if there is no further question, we will read section 103.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Harlow.

Mr. HARLOW. There is a correction of language in the bill, sir. On page 3, line 15, the word "word" should be "words."

The CHAIRMAN. Well, correct it.

All right, anything further from the staff?

Mr. BLANDFORD. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 103 then.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

MATERIALS AND PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 103. The Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to procure the materials and facilities, including guided missiles, necessary for the maintenance and support of the Army of the United States and its organizations and installations, including but not limited to (1) the supply of modern standard items of equipment; (2) the replacement of equipment as it becomes obsolete or unserviceable; (3) the provision of necessary spares and spare parts; and (4) the maintenance of such reserves of supplies and equipment as are necesary for the Army to perform it mission.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comments on section 103? If not——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, it is not very important, but this authorizes the Secretary to buy materials and facilities for the Army and its organizations and installations. However, in section 101 the bill states:

The organized peace establishment of the Army, its military organizations, installations, and supporting and auxiliary elements.

I wondered if that same expression might not properly be included in the authority of the Secretary to procure.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the staff answer the question?

Mr. HARLOW. I would believe, sir, that the expression "its organizations" would be adequate, but that it would definitely be sounder to have used the same language as is in the original section.

Mr. COLE. Well, it might avoid some conflict on interpretation by somebody later on if we clarified it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; without objection, the staff will fix that up.

Read the next, Mr. Blandford, section 104.

Mr. BLANDFORD. (reading):

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 104. The Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized to conduct, engage, and participate in research and development programs related to activities of the Army of the United States and to procure, or contract for the use of, such facilities, equipment, services, and supplies as may be required to effectuate such programs.

The CHAIRMAN. Any suggestions? If not, read the next one.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 105. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums of moneys as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title. Except as may otherwise be provided in the appropriation act concerned, (1) any moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of section 103 of this act shall remain available for obligating during the fiscal year for which appropriated and for the succeeding fiscal year, and shall remain available for expenditure for a total of 5 years; and (2) any moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of section 104 of this act shall remain available until expended.

Mr. SHORT. In line 14 there, you left in the words "for obligation", but you cut it out, didn't you, in line 18? That was the question we brought up Saturday.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Short, that was in connection with the comparable section for the Air Force.

Mr. BLANDFORD. The point is the same.

Mr. SHORT. You decided to leave that in?

Mr. BLANDFORD. No, sir; the Air Force deleted it because it is their understanding that the words "remain available until expended" covers everything.

Mr. SHORT. I see.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Now, it they leave the words "for obligation" insofar as the first part of section 105 is concerned, it may raise the inference that "for obligation" does not allow them to transfer their funds once they have been committed.

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. BLANDFORD. So there is definitely a point.

General Edwards might want to comment on that. You may have a definite point.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comment with reference——

Mr. SHORT. How about that, General Edwards?

General EDWARDS. Sir?

Mr. BLANDFORD. I am sorry, that would be General Dahlquist.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General DAHLQUIST. I am sorry, I didn't get the implication of it.

The CHAIRMAN. State it again, Mr. Short——

General DAHLQUIST. Will you state it again?

Mr. SHORT. On page 5, line 14, you left in the words "available for obligation", but if I recall right we amended it in line 18, particularly as it applies to the Air Force. But it holds true for both the Army and the Air Force.

General DAHLQUIST. Saturday there was a discussion whether or not the words "for obligation" could not be deleted.

Mr. SHORT. That is right. And Mr. Blandford was to confer with the counsel of the Department of the Air Force.

General DAHLQUIST. Yes.

Mr. BLANDFORD. The decision was that the elimination of the words "for obligation" was perfectly sound.

General DAHLQUIST. And the same thing holds on our section. That is, the two words "for obligation" might well be deleted.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, then, shall remain available——

Mr. SHORT. Until expended.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall remain available for expenditure for a total of 5 years. All you do is strike out the word "obligation" there.

Mr. COLE. No, Mr. Chairman. The point as I understand it is it permits the Army to obligate moneys that might be obligated for one fiscal year during that year or a suceeding year, but the expenditures of those obligations in either of the 2 years must be made within a period of 5 years from the time it is appropriated.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Mr. SHORT. I think Colonel Lancefield can clear up the point.

Digitized by Google

Colonel LANCEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Cole's statement is the way we understand the effect of the section. That is, for the general procurement of equipment, the money may be obligated during the year for which it is appropriated and the following year. And expenditures as against those obligations, but not new expenditures, may be made over a total of 5 years for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. That carries out, then, what is put in the appropriation bill as a contract authorization.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. The obligation means a contract authorization.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is made in the fiscal year for which it is appropriated. And when the article has been finished, then the appropriation is made.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is one point that I would like to ask Colonel Lancefield about, however, and that is after your funds have once been obligated under this language can you transfer your obligations?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. With respect to those authorized under section 103, which is for equipment and facilities, it is my understanding it would not be subject thereafter to transfer.

Mr. BLANDFORD. But under the other language: "Shall remain available until expended", it would permit you to transfer your obligation.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. Yes, sir, On research activities there would be the possibility of transferring those into other activities of the same type.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Go ahead——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. I would like to hear some justification for your being allowed to spread expenditures on research and development over a period greater than 5 years. Why shouldn't that 5-year limitation apply to research expenditures as well as procurement of anything else? You certainly ought to be able to lay out your research program and have it completed within a period of 5 years.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, that question was included in those which you submitted to the Department of the Army and the Air Force for reply and I should like to invite attention to the matters that were set forth therein.

The general basis of it is that some of these research and development projects are long-range matters and they have to continue for quite a while. We were asked and did submit examples of several types of research which would be a long continuation. So far as the funds themselves are concerned I anticipate that each year the appropriations committee will carefully go into the status of the projects that are underway and will also consider the available balance of both obligated and unobligated toward carrying those out.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you have some that are over 5 years, in anticipated duration?

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Digitized by Google

Colonel LANCEFIELD. If I may refer to this answer?

The majority of them are long-range in nature and upon initiation it may be, sometime, that completion will require some 3 years. Subsequent estimates may extend the time by several more years. The results of research are somewhat unpredictable and they are hard to schedule on a time basis. But civilian contractors, particularly State educational and nonprofit institutions, are reluctant to accept long-range projects and to retain a highly qualified personnel when there exists the possibility of a cancellation prior to completion for lack of sufficient funds to carry the thing out.

We had in here certain types of projects. I will have to refer to this thing.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest you insert in the record at this point the answer which has been submitted to the question which you raised.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. COLE. By the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Put that in.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

Question. For how long may funds be obligated, and for how long may funds be expended under the provisions of section 301—5 years, 6 years, or 7 years? Explain fully.

Answer. Under the provisions of section 301 as originally worded procurement funds are available for both obligation and expenditure for a period of 5 years; and research and development funds are available for both purposes until expended. In the revised section an appropriation authorization submitted by the Department of the Army (now labelled Sec. 105), procurement funds are available for obligation for 2 years and for expenditure for 5 years. Research and development funds remain "no year money" as in the original version of the bill.

Question. Explain the need for removing any limit on the length of time research funds will be available, pursuant to section 301.

Answer. The majority of research and development projects are long range in nature. Upon initiation of a project it may be estimated that completion will require 3 years. Subsequent estimates may extend the period by several more years. Thus results are unpredictable and do not lend themselves to a predetermined time schedule. For this reason any arbitrary time limit for expenditure of appropriations may jeopardize a worth-while project whose continuation depends on a subsequent year's appropriation. Civilian contractors are reluctant to accept long range projects, and hire highly qualified personnel, when there exists the posibility of cancellation prior to completion for lack of a new appropriation.

Mr. KELDAY. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this I think we ought to have the record show that we have considered the constitutional limitation on appropriations for the Army. It is a limitation which applies to the Army, that funds shall not be appropriated for a period in excess of 2 years. The Navy is not bound by it and I understand that the Air Force takes the position that they are probably not bound by it. There is not court decision anywhere to the effect that you can appropriate funds in excess of 2 years, but there is a decision by the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Comptroller General of the United States that it does not apply to equipment, munitions and facilities and things of that kind. But I think when we seek to pass a bill here that funds for the Army can remain available for 5 years, we should have it understood that we have considered the constitutional limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. You have that in the record?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir; it is in the record now.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the record. And, of course, that question will be raised in debate and we will explain the ruling of the Comptroller General and everyone.

Mr. Symington, do you want to say anything?

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, Mr. Chairman, I think Mr. Kilday covered my point, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. It is true that our lawyers and the Attorney General have both given decisions that any constitutional aspect does not apply to the Air Force.

The CHAIRMAN. Good.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Secretary, is that the reason you think that the term "for obligation" was put in there, because of the thought that there is some sort of constitutional inhibition against long-range appropriations?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I don't know that, sir. I would say from the standpoint of good business in my opinion it should be taken out of the Army bill, just like it should not be included in the Air Force bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the debate takes place on the bill——

Mr. DURHAM. Aren't those funds considered as spent with your letter of intent? The research goes on for 2 or 3 or 4 years, but it is considered as spent by the finance officers of the Army on the letter of intent.

The CHAIRMAN. They are not spent——

Mr. DURHAM. When you once obligate it and there is a letter of intent for the obligation, isn't that charged against you?

Colonel LANCEFIELD. I don't know that I understood Mr. Durham's question.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, the question is: When you obligate the funds and give a letter of intent, isn't that considered as spent?

Colonel LANCEFIELD. That money is then considered as obligated, when we enter into a contractual arrangement with the supplier or the builder. We do not desire or need, except for research projects——

Mr. DURHAM. You can't break that contract because the Supreme Court has ruled on that in the Post Office Department. Once a letter of intent has been given, you are obligated and you are compelled to carry out your contract.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. Yes, sir.

As to the other matter, we do not feel that we need the authority to obligate it beyond the year in which it has become appropriated and the succeeding fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, when that question arises on the floor, we have able constitutional lawyers and they can properly answer it. We cornfield lawyers will take care of the other sections of the bill.

Now read the Air Force section.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

TITLE II—AIR FORCE

THE AIR FORCE OF THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 201. (a) The Air Force of the United States shall consist of the United States Air Force (the Regular Air Force), the Air National Guard of the United States, the Air National Guard while in the service of the United States, and the United States Air Force Reserve; and shall include persons inducted, enlisted, or appointed without specification of component into the Air Force of the United States; and shall further include all of those Air units and other Air organizations, with their installations and supporting and auxiliary combat, training, administrative, and logistic elements and all personnel, including those not assigned to units, necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comments on that section? I want to congratulate the committee on at last being able to put language in here so we will know exactly what constitutes the Air Force.

Read the next section.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

AUTHORIZED COMPOSITION

(b) The Air Force of the United States shall have an authorized strength of 70 United States Air Force groups, 22 separate United States Air Force squadrons, and 61 Air Force Reserve groups, together with necessary supporting and auxiliary United States Air Force and Reserve units.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comments? If not, read the next section.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

AUTHORIZED PERSONNEL STRENGTH

SEC. 202. (a) There is hereby authorized for the Air Force of the United States an active-duty personnel strength of 502,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, exclusive of such 1-year enlistees as are or may be authorized by law, officer candidates, aviation cadets, and personnel of the Reserve components on active duty for training purposes only, persons paid under the appropriations for the Air National Guard and United States Air Force Reserve, and personnel and units of the Reserve components ordered to active duty in an emergency hereafter declared.

(b) Of the active-duty personnel strength authorized in subsection (a) of this section, not to exceed 27,500 may be active-list commissioned officers of the United States Air Force and 4,800 may be active-list warrant officers of the United States Air Force.

(c) There is hereby authorized for the Air National Guard and the Air National Guard of the United States a personnel strength, to be distributed among the several States, Territories, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia, of 100,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, including those members of the Air National Guard of the United States serving on active duty in the Air Force of the United States who are not counted within the personnel strength of 502,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Harlow.

Mr. HARLOW. I would like to raise a question on line 14, page 7. The words "Puerto Rico" appear there. The term "Puerto Rico" is not used in the corresponding section, which is identical except in respect of numbers, for the Army. They use the word "Territories" which is defined in the National Defense Act to include "Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico, Canal Zone, the militia of the Canal Zone," and so forth.

I would suggest either that the committee add the words "Puerto Rico" in the Army section or withdraw it here, and preferably withdraw it from the Air Force section.

Mr. SHORT. It is superfluous.

The CHAIRMAN. Well——

Mr. COLE. In some respects Puerto Rico is not a Territory.

Now, if the definition in law of a Territory includes the Panama Canal Zone and Puerto Rico, then it is proper to leave it out.

Mr. HARLOW. Yes, sir; the law is here and states specifically this——

The CHAIRMAN. That it is a Territory.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HARLOW. That "the word 'Territory' as used in this act," which is the National Defense Act, "and in all laws relating to the land militia and National Guard shall include and apply to Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico, and the Canal Zone."

The CHAIRMAN. Then you can take it out.

Mr. SHORT. Take it out.

The CHAIRMAN. Strike out "Puerto Rico."

All right. If there are no other comments——

Mr. COLE. No; I don't think so, Mr. Chairman.

That expression in the Defense Act specifically relates to the land militia and National Guard. This section doesn't relate to land militia or the National Guard. It relates to something totally different than what was referred to in that section. That is my opinion.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, whatever the committee decides to use on this is all right with us, but we have an Air National Guard unit in Puerto Rico. If there would be any repercussions about that, we want to present this to the committee so you will understand it.

Mr. COLE. Leave it in here. It may be inconsistent, but it won't do any harm.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that section is agreed to.

Now read section 203.

Mr. BLANDFORD. I have another subsection, which is (d).

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

(d) There is hereby authorized for the United States Air Force Reserve a personnel strength of 500,000 officers, warrant officers, and enlisted persons, including those members of the United States Air Force Reserve on active duty in the Air Force of the United States who are not counted within the personnel strength of the 502,000 authorized in subsection (a) of this section. Persons may be appointed as warrant officers in the United States Air Force Reserve under such regulations and in such numbers as the Secretary of the Air Force may prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comments on section 202? If not, read the next section.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

AIRCRAFT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 203. The Air Force of the United States is hereby authorized 24,000 serviceable aircraft or 225,000 airframe tons aggregate of serviceable aircraft, whichever amount the Secretary of the Air Force may determine is more appropriate to fulfill the requirements of the Air Force of the United States for aircraft necessary to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, That guided missiles shall not be included within the number of aircraft or airframe tons herein authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, read section 204.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 204. The Secretary of the Air Force is authorized to procure (1) 5,200 aircraft or 42,500 airframe tons annually, whichever amount the Secretary of the Air Force may determine is more appropriate, to provide the number of aircraft or airframe tons authorized by section 203 and to replace such aircraft as he may determine to be unserviceable or obsolete, (2) guided missiles, and (3) spares, spare parts, equipment, and facilities necessary for the maintenance and operation of aircraft and guided missiles herein authorized.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Secretary, that is elastic enough for you to keep up with progress and development?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, Mr. Short, that is, sir.

Mr. SHORT. It must necessarily be so, too?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I agree with you.

Mr. SHORT. I mean, airplanes become obsolete, so in fact it must be elastic.

Secretary SYMINGTON. We agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Read section 205.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 205. The Secretary of the Air Force is hereby authorized to conduct, engage, and participate in research and development programs related to activities of the Air Force of the United States and to procure, or contract for the use of, such facilities, equipment, services, and supplies as may be required to effecuate such programs.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comments? If not, read section 206.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATIONS

SEC. 206. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may be necessary, to carry out the purposes of this title. Moneys appropriated to carry out the purposes of sections 204 and 205 of this title shall remain available until expended.

The CHAIRMAN. Any comments? If not, read section 207.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, could I comment on that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Secretary SYMINGTON. I thing Mr. Cole asked a very pertinent question to our problem, inasmuch as in fields like the guided missile field, for example, there is much research in addition to straight development. I have 10 of them and I just checked 2 of them. One was started in 1945 and estimated to be completed in 1954. Another started in 1945 and is estimated to be completed in 1958. The third one had an 8-year span. That is 10, 13, and 8.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Secretary, would this include the development of new aircraft? For instance, I think the record shows that it has taken as long as 10 or 12 years sometimes to develop new type of aircraft. This would include it, would it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. For instance, I believe the B–29, or was it the B–17, took about 10 years to develop?

Secretary SYMINGTON. I think the B–17 took about 8 years.

Mr. BROOKS. Eight years?

Secretary SYMINGTON. The B–29 took a little faster because it was under wartime impetus.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I don't see anything for orthodox weapons, like machine guns. Would that include it?

Secretary SYMINGTON. Machine guns are developed for us by the Army. If there was any special work of that character for airplanes——

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there a field of weapons that wouldn't be included in what you have here?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. I don't think so, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Now read section 207—
Mr. KILDAY. Just on that point.
Mr. Secretary, do you reimburse the Army for armament?
Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. KILDAY. That is reimbursed under your appropriation?
Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.
The CHAIRMAN. Read section 207.
Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

SAVING PROVISION

SEC. 207. No provision of this title shall be construed as modifying the existing status of the Air National Guard of the United States as a Reserve component of the Air Force of the United States, or as amending or modifying in any way section 60 of the National Defense Act of 1916, as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. General Reckord.
General RECKORD. Yes, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you any comment on section 207?
General RECKORD. Very satisfactory, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Satisfactory to you, Mr. Symington?
Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Read the next section, then——
Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, you raised a question a while ago whether the Department would go along with the bill in the Senate. I would like to ask the same question of General Reckord.
The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I am satisfied you are going to support it, are you not, General?
General RECKORD. I didn't hear the question, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to wreck the bill in the Senate or are you going along?
General RECKORD. We are going to support the bill as it is reported from this committee.
The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir.
Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question right there?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.
Mr. SASSCER. I notice the authorized strength of the Reserve is approximately five times that of the National Guard. It is anticipated to build up a Reserve five times as big as the National Guard?
The CHAIRMAN. General Evans?
Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir, we will support the bill.
The CHAIRMAN. Well, the reason we put the figure 980,000 for the Reserve is because we want them to have a worth-while Reserve.
As a matter of fact, you recall that when we passed an act requiring every man who left the service to go into the Reserve, somehow or another they forgot it and nobody went in the Reserve. Now we are going to try to build up the Reserve.
Mr. SASSCER. I wasn't questioning the building up of the Reserve. My question was directed as to whether or not it was anticipated that we would build up a Reserve in line with these components five times as big as the National Guard.
In other words, in the bill you authorize a Reserve five times as large as the National Guard; one, 500,000 and one, 100,000.

Digitized by Google

Do they anticipate having a Reserve of that size?

Colonel OLIVER. At the present time there are some two hundred-odd thousand Air Reserve officers and one hundred-odd thousand Air enlisted men. Am I correct, General Quesada?

General QUESADA. That is right.

Coloned OLIVER. In other words, they are actually in existence at the present time although they have not been organized as units.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I may say, I am hoping a little bit later on that the committee will authorize an investigation in regard to what is being done by the Department with reference to building up a Reserve. It has 70-some-odd million dollars and it is the first Department that I have ever known that isn't spending what it gets. So we want to have a little hearing later on to see what is being accomplished. I think we all have the same objective in view. No doubt the Department will build up a Reserve as fast as possible. So we have been rather generous in the over-all ceiling, but we don't want to merely put it on paper. We want to put it in being. If we can aid the Department in putting it in being, why that is what we want to do. So the hearing will at least commence friendly. I don't know where it will end up. But we all have the objective of trying to build up the Reserve.

Now, of course, we all recognize the fact that the Department has concentrated on the National Guard and has accomplished something that we can all feel proud of.

Now it might not have been possible to have accomplished both at the same time. Since then we have built up such a strong National Guard that it is, I would say, about 75 percent complete, so now we want to turn some of our thoughts to the Reserve and try to do something for the Reserve.

Now, read the next section.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

Repeal of existing law. SEC. 208. Section 8 of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 780), as amended by section 1 of the act of April 3, 1939 (53 Stat. 555), is hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me ask you, what law is that?

Mr. HARLOW. That is the aircraft authorization, sir, on the present law allowing 6,000 aircraft for the old Army Air Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. KILDAY. Is that still in the law? I thought we repealed that.

Mr. HARLOW. No, sir. That was suspended.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, read the next section.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SAVING PROVISION

SEC. 301. Nothing in this act shall be construed to alter or modify the duties and authority of the Secretary of Defense and the Departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment as provided in the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, 80th Cong.).

The CHAIRMAN. That simply means that the powers delegated in the National Security Act are not diminished or increased. They are just standing exactly where they are.

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, could I make a comment on the section ahead of that, sir?

The Chairman. Yes.

Secretary SYMINGTON. First, with respect to the Reserve, the Reserve Officers Association has many members of the former Regular Air Force in it and we are very grateful to General Evans and his people for supporting this and helping us with this bill. However, we have two other organizations which are also most interested in the Air Force Reserve.

First, is the Air Reserve Association, of which General McCarthy of Oregon is now the President and General Bob Smith of Dallas was the President. And when hearings come up which involve the Air Force Reserve, we would like to have them here also, if that is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. You mustn't construe what I said in the slightest degree as criticism.

Secretary SYMINGTON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We know what you have been handicapped with. We know how hard you worked to build up the guard. You can't do both at the same time.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you have made such a wonderful record with that we feel with a little aid and assistance and cooperation of the committee we can point with the same degree of pride to the Reserve a little bit later on.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Thank you, sir.

Then there is one other organization which has great interest in the Air Force and where we have forced our generals and privates who are in the same membership, and that is the Air Force Association.

When Reserve and Air Force questions come up, we would appreciate it if you and this committee would consider them.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir, it will be a pleasure.

Secretary SYMINGTON. There is one other——

The CHAIRMAN. The only suggestion I have: Don't try to build up too many witnesses.

Secretary SYMINGTON. They will be short, but I think that will be pertinent.

The only other point is, when we talk about the Reserve, I think we ought to realize that our great problem in the air aspect of Reserves is the problem of equipment. For example, I asked General McConnell how many men use a plane in the National Guard and he says that the National Guard has one plane per man—is that right?

General MCCONNELL. Crew.

Secretary SYMINGTON. One crew per plane. That is one pilot, therefore, because 24 of the 27 groups are fighter.

If you want to see what we get into if we try to carry out that policy with Reserves then multiply 109,000 pilots who are in the Reserves by $165,000 to $765,000, which is the range of cost of modern fighter planes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, of course, all those are factors to be considered when we get to it. But we will try to help you along on that.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the word "later" in here is a little confusing. The provisions of this act do alter some of the duties and authority of the Secretary of Defense.

Digitized by Google

As I understand it, this simply means that the provisions of this law are in addition to the authority and duties prescribed in the National Security Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no. There is nothing in this act that confers any more authority on the Secretary than he has under the act of 1947.

What the objective of this is is just to let it stand in status quo, and nothing in this act changes his status and his powers in the slightest degree.

Now, whether you say "alter," it might create the impression that there is something in here that did alter it, but I am hoping there is nothing in here that does alter his powers.

You think it indicates that something in here has altered it?

Mr. ELSTON. Well, it would look like some more authority is given than existed in the National Defense Act. We want to make it plain that that is in addition to his authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the staff raises the point, that might be raised on the floor and might be raised here.

What is the authority of the two Secretaries now with reference to for example procurement. That is set out in the National Military Establishment law. Nothing in this law supersedes or delegated any higher authority to the Secretaries than the National Military Establishment law.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, if I may answer that, sir—and I know you want to get ahead—in the present procurement law we are not allowed to procure until first we obtain approval of the Secretary of Defense.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Then he passes our procurement to the Research and Development Board and to the Munitions Board. Then after that is over, all procurement has to go to the Bureau of the Budget and the President issues a statement approving the recommendation of the Secretary of Defense.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in accordance with the amendment that was written in the appropriation bill.

Secretary SYMINGTON. In the appropriations bill plus the administrative procedure that the Secretary of Defense has decided on with respect to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, it has been suggested on section 301 that it should be modified to read this way:

> The provisions of this act shall be subject to the duties and authority of the Secretary of Defense and agencies of the National Military Establishment.

Then, that makes it a little bit clearer.

Mr. Cole has offered that amendment and I suggest that it be put in.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. That the provisions of this act shall be subject to the duties and authority of the Secretary of National Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment, as provided in the National Security Act of 1947.

Mr. KILDAY. I think we ought to get it clear here that the authority now held by the Secretaries is the same as the authority that we are putting in one law here. This doesn't alter existing law in any major respect, does it? You now have the procurement authority that we are expressing in definite language in one bill?

Digitized by Google

Secretary SYMINGTON. I would say "Yes"; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. In other words, there is nothing in this bill that changes your method of procurement. And the committee wants to let it stand just like it is now, but at the same time we don't want to disturb the National Military Establishment law.

We want that to stand just like it is.

Mr. KILDAY. So the House won't get the impression that we are granting new and novel authority to the Secretaries which they don't already have. They do have it at this time.

Secretary SYMINGTON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. So the House also won't get in mind that we are granting additional powers to the Secretary of National Defense.

Now, without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Now read the last one.

Mr. BLANDFORD (reading):

SEPARABILITY PROVISION

SEC. 302. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the Act and of the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, that finishes a section by section reading for consideration of the committee of the proposed substitute print.

Any comment from any members of the committee? If not, then I will ask the clerk to call the roll. And all in favor of voting for this amendment to strike out all of the enacting clause and insert the committee print No. 2 as amended, when your name is called, vote, "aye" and all opposed, "no."

Call the roll——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, let me ask if there is any objection to introducing this as a new bill, to avoid the confusion in handling it on the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. I am purposely asking the committee to let it go in this way to show the House the care with which the committee considered it. There won't be any confusion because we are merely striking out what was first in 1437 and then this comes right behind it, without any amendments in it at all, and so you have only one vote in the House.

Mr. COLE. Then I suggest that in your rule you ask to have the bill considered as a new bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, is your motion to move in favor of consideration of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. And report it?

The CHAIRMAN. Report the bill favorably.

Call the roll.

(Whereupon, a roll call was taken.)

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum being present, the bill is unanimously reported.

Now, members of the committee, I will ask for a rule, and I will notify Mr. Short if he is here or Mr. Arends or Mr. Cole. It is always the policy to notify the ranking minority member when you go before the Rules Committee so he can go or at least express his position. The thought is running through my mind to ask the Rules Committee to give 4 hours' general debate because there will not be much under the 5-minute rule for debate. And I hope all of the members, when the bill is considered on the floor, will participate in the debate.

Now I would like to have, in view of our vote, authority when I appear before the Appropriations Committee in support of a provision for a 70-air group, to assure the Appropriations Committee that the Armed Services Committee feels like the appropriations should be increased at least $800,000,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I make that motion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. I second the motion.

Mr. BROOKS. That you be given that authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I understand that I will be so authorized. And I will ask Mr. Short to also appear before the Appropriations Committee in support of an increased appropriation of at least $800,000,000.

Mr. KILDAY. I don't hear any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, so it is understood.

Now, members of the committee, there is a bill introduced by our distinguished colleague and former Senator from New York, as I always address him, because I knew him down here when he was a Senator, H. R. 1945, to permit the Vice President to be a member of the National Security Council. I would like to take that bill up tomorrow morning, and I would like for the staff to notify Mr. Wadsworth, if it meets his convenience, to be here. I don't think there will be a long discussion of the bill because it is so clear and defines what it proposes to do.

Then there is a bill that I introduced on my own volition, H. R. 2010, to give to the Armed Services Committee of the House and Senate the same control over the acquisition and disposal of realty and enter into contracts for realty that the committee had with reference to the Navy Department.

I would like also to take that bill up tomorrow morning, after we finish with Mr. Wadsworth, and ask that the clerks notify someone from the War Department, if they want to be heard, and the Air Force if they want to be heard, to be here. It is purely a question of policy for us to fix, but we would like to have the benefit of their views.

Now, after we get through with these two bills tomorrow, if we can dispose of them, I am asking that Mr. Durham's subcommittee sit and commence a hearing on the radar bill that has been referred to him.

The other two subcommittees, if they desire to take up what bills are before them, I will ask that they go to work on those matters referred to them.

I think that is all we have this morning, and unless there is something we will take a recess until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, the committee adjourned.)

[No. 13]

TO UNIFY, CONSOLIDATE, REVISE, AND CODIFY THE ARTICLES OF WAR, THE ARTICLES FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE NAVY, AND THE DISCIPLINARY LAWS OF THE COAST GUARD AND TO ENACT AND ESTABLISH A UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE (H. R. 2498). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, February 8, 1949.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith, on behalf of the National Military Establishment, a draft of a proposed bill to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice.

The proposed code is based on a study made by a special committee in this office, of which Prof. Edmund M. Morgan, Jr., of the Harvard Law School was chairman. The code covers both the substantive and procedural law governing military justice and its administration in all the armed forces of the United States and is uniformly applicable in all its parts to the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Coast Guard in time of war and peace.

The proposed code provides the sole statutory authority for—

(1) The infliction of limited disciplinary penalties for minor offenses without judicial action;

(2) The establishment of pretrial and trial procedure;

(3) The creation and constitution of three classes of courts martial corresponding to those now in existence;

(4) The eligibility of members of each of the courts and the qualifications of its officers and counsel;

(5) The review of findings and sentence and the creation and constitution of the reviewing tribunals; and

(6) The listing and definition of offenses, redrafted and rephrased in modern legislative language.

Attention is called to the provisions of the code which are designed to provide for uniformity in the administration of military justice, to those designed to assure the accused a fair trial, to those designed to prevent undue control or interference with the administration of military justice, and to those designed to preserve appropriate military functions.

Among the provisions designed to insure uniformity are the following:

(1) The offenses made punishable by the code are identical for all armed forces;

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

(2) The same system of courts with the same limits of jurisdiction of each court is set up in all the armed forces;

(3) The procedure for general courts martial is identical as to institution of charges, pretrial investigation, action by the convening authority, review by the Board of Review, and review by the Judicial Council in all the armed forces;

(4) The rules of procedure at the trial, including modes of proof, are equally applicable to all the armed forces;

(5) The Judge Advocates General of the three departments are required to make uniform rules of procedure for the Board of Review in each department;

(6) The required qualifications for members of the court, law officer, and counsel are identical for all the armed forces;

(7) The single Judicial Council, which finally decides all questions of law, is the court of last resort for each of the armed forces; and also acts with the Judge Advocates General of the three departments as an advisory body with a view to securing uniformity in policy and in sentences and in discovering and remedying defects in the system and its administration.

Among the provisions designed to insure a fair trial are the following:

General courts martial

(1) A pretrial investigation is provided, at which the accused is entitled to be present with counsel to cross-examine available witnesses against him and to present evidence in his own behalf. It has some features of preliminary hearing and some of pretrial discovery as used in the civil courts.

(2) A prohibition against referring any charge for trial which does not state an offense or is not shown to be supported by sufficient evidence.

(3) A mandatory provision for competent, legally trained counsel at the trial for both the prosecution and the defense.

(4) A prohibition against requesting any statement from the accused without warning, and against compelling self-incrimination, and against reception in evidence of improperly obtained statements.

(5) Provision for equal process to accused and prosecution for obtaining witnesses and depositions and a provision allowing only the accused to use depositions in a capital case.

(6) A provision giving an accused enlisted man the privilege of having enlisted men as members of the court trying his case.

(7) A provision whereby voting on challenges, findings, and sentence is by secret ballot of the members of the court.

(8) A provision requiring the law officer to instruct the court on the record concerning the elements of the offense, presumption of innocence, and the burden of proof.

(9) A provision for an automatic review of the trial record for errors of law and of fact by a Board of Review with the right of the accused to be represented by legally competent counsel.

(10) A provision for the review of the record for errors of law by the Judicial Council. This review is automatic in the case where the sentence is death or dismissal and is upon petition showing probable error of law where the sentence involves more than 1 year's confinement, with the right to be represented by competent counsel.

(11) A prohibition against receiving pleas of guilty in capital cases.

Digitized by Google

Special courts martial

In addition to certain of the above provisions which also apply to special courts martial, there is provided as follows:

(1) The trial counsel and defense counsel must be equally qualified.

(2) In cases where a bad-conduct discharge has been imposed, a full stenographic transcript must be taken and the case is reviewed in the same fashion as a general court-martial record.

(3) Peremptory challenge and voting by secret ballot is provided as in a general court martial.

(4) Review by judge advocate or legal officer is required.

Summary courts martial

(1) Provision is made for permitting an accused to refuse trial by summary court upon request.

(2) Review by a judge advocate or legal officer is required.

Among some of the provisions designed to prevent interference with the due administration of justice are the following:

(1) The convening authority may not refer charges for trial until they are found legally sufficient by the staff judge advocate or legal officer.

(2) The staff judge advocate or legal officer is authorized to communicate directly with the Judge Advocate General.

(3) All counsel at a general court-martial trial are required to be lawyers and to be certified by the Judge Advocate General as qualified to perform their legal duties.

(4) The law officer—a competent lawyer—rules on all questions raised at the trial, except on a motion for a directed verdict and on the issue of the accused's sanity.

(5) The convening authority must not act on a finding or sentence of a general court martial without first obtaining the advice of his staff judge advocate or legal officer.

(6) The Board of Review, situated in the office of the Judge Advocate General and removed from the convening authority, is composed of legally trained men and reviews the trial record for errors of law and of fact.

(7) The Judicial Council is composed of civilians and passes finally on all questions of law.

(8) When counsel appear before the Board of Review and the Judicial Council, both parties must be represented by qualified lawyers.

(9) Censure by a commanding officer of a court martial or any member or officer thereof because of any judicial action of the court or any member or officer is forbidden and any attempt improperly to influence official action in any aspect of a trial or its review is prohibited.

Elements of command

Among the command functions which are found in the present Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy, the following provisions have been retained:

(1) Commanding officers refer the charges in general, special and summary courts martial and convene the courts.

(2) Commanding officers appoint the members of the courts.

(3) Commanding officers appoint the law officer and counsel for the trial.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

(4) Commanding officers retain full power to set aside findings of guilty and to modify or change the sentence, but are not permitted to interfere with verdicts of not guilty nor to increase the severity of the sentence imposed.

(5) The powers of commanding officers at mast and company punishment are retained for minor offenses which require prompt action and for which comparatively light punishments can be imposed. The procedural safeguards in this type of nonjudicial punishment are considerably less than in the courts martial, but are believed to be reasonably adequate.

I regard this proposed bill as an outstanding example of unification in the armed services. In my opinion, the proposed bill is well-designed to protect the rights of those subject to it, will increase public confidence in military justice, and will not impair the performance of military functions. Accordingly, I strongly urge its passage by the Congress.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised me that the proposed bill is fully in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

FULL COMMITTEE HEARING ON H. R. 1945, TO AMEND THE NATIONAL SECURITY ACT OF 1947 BY PROVIDING THAT THE VICE PRESIDENT SHALL BE A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Wednesday, February 9, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

The first bill to be called up this morning is H. R. 1945, introduced by the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Wadsworth.

(H. R. 1945 is as follows:)

[H. R. 1945, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To amend the National Security Act of 1947 by providing that the Vice President shall be a member of the National Security Council

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the fourth paragraph of section 101 (a) of the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress) is hereby amended by inserting after "President;" the following: "the Vice President;".

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Wadsworth, the committee will be pleased to have you make any statement you desire to make with reference to this bill.

STATEMENT BY HON. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FORTY-FIRST DISTRICT, STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you for giving me this opportunity and I can assure you that my observations will not be very lengthy.

This bill, H. R. 1945, which I introduced on January 27 last, seeks to amend the National Security Act of 1947 by providing that the Vice President shall be a member of the National Security Council.

The make-up of the National Security Council will be found in section 101 of the National Security Act of 1947, the first section under title I of that act. It is found on page 2 of the printed copy of the act. It reads:

There is hereby established a council to be known as the National Security Council, hereinafter in this section referred to as the Council. The President of the United States shall preside over the meetings of the Council: Provided, That in his absence he may designate a member of the Council to preside in his place.

Digitized by Google

I shall not read the whole section. [Reading:]

The function of the Council shall be to advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security so as to enable the military service and the other departments and agencies of the Government to operate more effectively in the matter involving the national security.

The section goes on to recite that in addition to the President, the Council shall consist of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Air Force, the Chairman of the National Security Resource Board; and then goes on to say:

and such of the following-named officers of executive departments: The Chairman of the Munitions Board, the Chairman of Research and Development Board, but no such additional member shall be designated until the advice and consent of the Senate has been given to his appointment to the office he is holding.

As you will see, the attempt here made was to establish a consultative body whose members should exchange information and discussions of policy with the President presiding and thus integrate as the section implies, or seeks to do, the performance of the United States in the field of foreign relations, and in the field of national defense, having in mind, of course, all the time that our resources; that is, our national resources as well as our manpower, are an exceedingly important element in the whole picture.

It is the first time in the history of our Government that such a council has been set up, and, for one, I rejoice that it has been done. I think it fair to say that in all probability it is the most important consultative body created by statute in the structure of our Government.

The Cabinet is not created by statute.

Mr. KILDAY. I did not catch that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Cabinet is not created by statute. Heads of departments may be members of the Cabinet, but I think the Cabinet itself is not defined in any statute. I may be mistaken.

Mr. KILDAY. I thought that it was.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, I may be mistaken.

Mr. KILDAY. I do not know.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In any event, the purpose of this section, I think, is obvious and very meritorious.

Now, talk has been going on for years and years as to what service to his country the Vice President of the United States might perform. I am now speaking impersonally. As a matter of fact, and this is off the record.

(Discussion had outside the record.)

Mr. WADSWORTH. The only duty assigned to him is to preside over the Senate. He is not the servant of the President. We cannot put him in an administrative job and thus make him a subordinate of the President. It is difficult to find for him any administrative job even if we wanted to do so. We cannot put him at the head of a department. But it strikes me that a person occupying that office might well be assigned to a position on a consultative or advisory body such as the Security Council. His accession would add an additional civilian, and it may be noted that the Council here, according to the opinion of some people, is a little overweighted with representatives of the military branches. True, they are all civilians, but four of them represent the Military Establishment: The Secretary of Defense and the three departmental secretaries. The Secretary of State is a civilian, of course, and without connection with the Military Establishment, and the Chairman of the National Resources Board is a civilian without connection with the Military Establishment.

Digitized by Google

So that by adding the Vice President, you would add an out-and-out civilian. But to my mind, there is something more important about it than merely adding the Vice President as a consultant. He is the potential successor of the President of the United States from the moment he takes office. I do not think I am wrong in saying that generally speaking back through the years the Vice Presidents, with perhaps one or two exceptions, have not had an opportunity to become thoroughly informed as to what was going on inside the higher echelons of the United States Government.

Some Presidents, of course, have invited, on their own initiative, a Vice President to sit in occasionally. Other Presidents have not done so. And there could be no reliance that such a custom would prevail invariably down through the decades that are to come.

If the Vice President of the United States were given a seat on this Council, he would thus become thoroughly informed as the result of the discussions in the Council concerning the intricacies of our foreign policies, the problems of our national defense, and the fundamental problems of our national resources, so that if by some unfortunate event he should suddenly find himself in the office of the President of the United States, he would not go into that office uninformed.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. But is it not your concept of the office of Vice President that he is a representative of the legislative branch, rather than of the executive branch, and by putting him on this Council we have representation from the legislative branch which we do not now have?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, there we get into a constitutional question. I do not visualize the Vice President as a member of the legislative branch.

Mr. KILDAY. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. True, he presides over one of the bodies.

Mr. KILDAY. That is his only duty; his only constitutional duty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The only duty and the only part he takes in legislation is when there is a tie vote in the Senate. He takes no part in the preparation of bills. He is not a member of a standing committee. He is a figure, and a dignified figure.

Mr. KILDAY. In close contact with the legislative branch.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But he is in close contact personally with 96 Senators, which is a valuable contact——

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he is to bring his knowledge resulting from those contacts to the attention of this Council. And certainly I would not say that he was a member of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. KILDAY. He has no executive duties.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a matter of fact, he has scarcely anything to do except preside with dignity.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. Well, you mentioned that you had not spoken to Mr. Barkley about this, but it is your understanding that he would welcome this opportunity; is that right?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no information about it at all.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, he is a vigorous, active man.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was somewhat encouraged when upon the day of his inauguration, or perhaps the day afterward, the Vice President said he would be glad to do some more work. I remember he said something to that effect.

Mr. BROOKS. Senator, the Vice President is one of the two men in the National Government that has the endorsement of a majority of the people of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A majority of the electoral college.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, the electoral college, but that, to all intents and purposes, carries with it the majority of the people voting in the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROOKS. All of the other legislators in the Senate or the House represent areas.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. I think it can be said truthfully that he represents, to a very considerable degree, the people of the United States, and potentially he is the Chief Executive.

I shall not go into details, gentlemen, because it would not be fitting, but within my knowledge, there have been occasions when a Vice President has succeeded to the Presidency without knowing what has been going on.

Mr. ARENDS. That is one of the most pertinent parts of your argument.

Mr. KILDAY. Very frequently that has been true.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Senator, it is your thought, too, that the Vice President would bring to this Council probably first-hand sentiment as far as legislation is concerned in the Congress?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He would be a good liaison officer, as it were, between the legislative branch and this Council.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Would it throw out of balance the Council in any way? You did mention the military and civilian composition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot see that it would.

Now, some recommendations are coming to this committee, I am told, from the Hoover Commission. I am not certain about them, but my best information is to the effect that the Hoover Commission will recommend that the three departmental Secretaries retire from the Security Council. That will leave the Council consisting of the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Chairman of the Security Resources Board.

By adding the Vice President, you will make a board of five, and for other reasons which are far more important, I think his addition would be very valuable to the Council and to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, any questions to the Senator from any members of the committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is one other thing which may occur. I noticed in the press of yesterday a sort of map or chart of the topside organizations which may be recommended by the Hoover Commission, and on that map or chart it is indicated that this Council be what might be termed a "personal agency" of the President. There were one or two others, also.

Digitized by Google

If this committee should decide to act favorably upon this bill and a certain change in the position of the Council be recommended later and approved by the Congress—and it will have to be under a separate package—it might be that the title of this bill or the section mentioned would have to be changed, but the passage of the bill would make no difference whatsoever otherwise.

Mr. DOYLE. May I ask a question, Mr. Chariman?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Doyle.

Mr. DOYLE. Why do you figure the framers of our Constitution did not decide some more specific duty for the Vice President than just presiding over the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, I am not a constitutional lawyer, but let me make this suggestion: Under the Constitution, the entire executive power is lodged with the President of the United States and no one can share it with him, not even the Vice President. So it would be pretty difficult for any Congress to give or the original writers of the Constitution to have given the Vice President an administrative or executive job.

The Chairman. I would say, members of the committee, the Senator discussed this matter with me before he introduced this bill and it impressed me so much that I asked him to introduce the bill. I think it is a very fine step in utilizing a very key person, the Vice President.

As the Senator pointed out, it might so happen in the future, as it happened in the past, that the Vice President must take charge. So it is highly important that he be conversant with what is going on as far as it is humanly possible to do so, and this does afford him an opportunity to do it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So if there are no further questions from the members of the committee——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just one other suggestion by way of warning.

The Chairman. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Some have suggested to me that the statute cites the Vice President as vice chairman of this Council. I hope that is not done.

The CHAIRMAN. No; you are right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Give him nothing that bears a resemblance to an office.

Mr. KILDAY. Let the Council pick its chairman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Senator, to me the most important part of this is—and I want to know if you concur with me: It may very well be that this whole Council, including the President, never had any legislative experience and there ought to be somebody on there who understands the legislation in the National Government, because much of what they do will finally find its way through the Halls of Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. And there you have a man who is really an expert on it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is your liaison.

Mr. KILDAY. I still insist that the Vice President is a representative of the legislative branch.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. A quorum of the committee is present; is that right?

Mr. HARPER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be favorably reported, and I will try to call it one day next week.

And Mr. Wadsworth, when this bill is called up, I will yield the time to you to address the House and explain the justification and reason for the bill. So we will keep you posted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will do my best to empty the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. HARPER. Who is going to report the bill?

BCOMMITTEE HEARINGS ON H. R. 2546 TO AUTHORIZE THE SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE TO ESTABLISH LAND-BASED AIR WARNING AND CONTROL INSTALLATIONS FOR THE NATIONAL SECURITY, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE No. 3,
Thursday, February 10, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham (subcommittee chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. Let the committee come to order.

Members of the committee and representatives of the armed servs. it is to be expected that a great deal of the information pertaining this bill will necessarily be of a classified nature, so I am going to quest that the services reply in open session to all questions which k information that is not classified, and then later on we can go to executive session to hear the answers to questions which bring t information of a classified character.

In this way we will handle the hearings in approximately the same nner as it is proposed to handle the questions that were submitted all three of the armed services by the committee 2 days ago and ich relate to some of the underlying issues and assumptions pering to the bill.

The services have been asked to submit written replies to all of these estions. They have been asked to divide their answers into two itten sets: One set containing those which are unclassified and the her set containing those which are classified.

I trust that the services will have the answers to these questions as rly as possible and will be prepared to place in the record during e open session the written answers to those questions which they n answer. And I would appreciate it if they would be prepared to esent the written answers to classified questions to the full subommittee during a closed session.

This morning we have before us a bill which was introduced yesterday (H. R. 2546), which all you members have a copy of.

(H. R. 2546 is as follows:)

manent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, utilities, and access roads, and to provide for necessary administration and planning therefor, without regard to sections 1136, 3648, 3734, Revised Statutes, as he may deem necessary in the interest of national security.

SEC. 2. In furtherance of the above, the Secretary of the Air Force is authorized to make surveys and to acquire lands and rights pertaining thereto or other interests therein, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, and to place permanent and temporary improvements thereon whether such lands are held in fee or under lease, or under other temporary tenure.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, and when so specified in an appropriation Act such amounts shall remain available until expended.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE.
Washington, February 8, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Secretary of the Air Force recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation also attached, bearing the title "To authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations for the national security, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Air Force.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

FEBRUARY 8, 1949.

The SPEAKER, THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is submitted herewith draft of a proposed bill "To authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations for the national security, and for other purposes", which the Department of the Air Force recommends be enacted into law. The Secretary of Defense has assigned responsibility for the preparation and submission of this measure on behalf of the National Military Establishment to this Department.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to enable the Secretary of the Air Force to establish and develop, within and without the continental limits of the United States, in fulfilling the air-defense responsibilities of the Department of the Air Force, such land-based air warning and control facilities as he may deem necessary in the interest of national security. The establishment of an effective land-based radar protective screen will entail the construction, installation, and equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, utilities, and access roads. To accomplish the necessary construction work, the proposed legislation authorizes the Secretary of the Air Force to acquire land and rights thereto by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned land, or any other means, and to erect temporary or permanent facilities thereon without regard to sections 1136, 3648 and 3734, Revised Statutes, as amended.

The fiscal effect of this proposed legislation for construction will be $85,500,000 divided into increments in the fiscal years 1949 and 1950.

This report has been coordinated among the departments and boards of the National Military Establishment in accordance with the procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report to the Congress.

Sincerely,

STUART SYMINGTON.

Mr. DURHAM. We will have the first witness from the Air Force this morning, who is General Fairchild.

General Fairchild, do you have a written statement that you can give the committee this morning?

Digitized by Google

General FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I do.

Mr. DURHAM. You can proceed with your statement.

STATEMENT BY GEN. MUIR S. FAIRCHILD, VICE CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

General FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I am General Fairchild, Vice Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Department of the Air Force, on behalf of the National Military Establishment, much appreciates this opportunity to appear before your committee in support of this authorization bill.

The Air Force considers this bill to be of exceptional and pressing importance. It grants authorization to the Secretary of the Air Force, in fulfillment of the air-defense responsibilities of the Air Force, to establish the land-based aircraft warning and control facilities deemed necessary in the interest of national security.

It is, of course, quite unnecessary to stress the importance of providing the people, the Government and the industry of this country as adequate defense against attack from the air as is economically feasible. However, the basic importance of aircraft warning and control facilities in providing any sort of defense against attack from the air may not be so obvious.

To emphasize the importance which the Air Force attaches to the warning and control installations and facilities system authorized by this bill, I should like to stress that we know of no effective defense of any sort against attack from the air in the absence of such a system. Lacking such installations and facilities, we could expect no adequate warning of impending air attack. Our fighter aircraft could not be directed to intercept and oppose the hostile bombers. Our antiaircraft artillery would not be alerted to fire on the enemy planes as they approached. Even our people in their homes and factories would not have accurate warning to seek shelter in the event of hostile penetration of our defenses. Failure to provide such a system, therefore, could result in disaster on a Nation-wide scale and surely would result in unnecessary death and destruction throughout our country should we be attacked in the future. I consider the passage of this authorization act essential to the security of the United States.

It will require a considerable time to install, perfect, and make operational an adequate warning and control system. The urgency of authorization to begin this vital task is obvious.

Since the establishment of an aircraft warning and control radar system is of such singular and exceptional importance to the Nation as a defensive measure, the Air Force strongly believes and recommends that it should be specifically authorized by the Congress. We feel that a construction program of such magnitude and importance involving $85,500,000 should be approved by the Congress as a separate program and apart from the usual public-works authorization. I should like to emphasize that legislation for the establishment of such a system is in furtherance of a program approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and that this bill bears the approval of the Secretary of Defense and the Bureau of the Budget.

Digitized by Google

The Office of the Secretary of Defense has requested that the Department of the Air Force present an additional section to be added to the bill to read as follows:

The provisions of this Act shall be subject to the duties and authority of the Secretary of Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment as provided in the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress).

Mr. Chairman, I should like at this time to introduce Maj. Gen. Gordon P. Saville, commanding general of the Air Defense Command, who is our acknowledged expert in this field. He will present the plan which the Air Force proposes to follow under this requested authorization. Thereafter, we will be available to answer any questions which the committee may desire.

Mr. DURHAM. General, you may proceed with your statement. Have you a prepared statement?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir; I have.

Mr. DURHAM. Has the committee been furnished with copies?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

(Copies distributed.)

Mr. DURHAM. You may proceed, General.

STATEMENT BY MAJ. GEN. GORDON P. SAVILLE, COMMANDING GENERAL, AIR DEFENSE COMMAND, USAF

General SAVILLE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, for the committee's information I should like to outline briefly the major principles upon which our requirements for aircraft warning are based. Some of the items I will cover are somewhat elementary, and undoubtedly a great many of the members of the committee will find that I am covering matters with which they are already very familiar. I believe, however, that it will serve a useful purpose in informing any members who are not already particularly familiar with radar and in reviewing our thoughts concerning the subject for the entire committee.

Basically, an aircraft warning and control system consists of radar stations, control centers, and a system of intercommunication. Its prime purpose is to detect and track enemy aircraft and to provide the information for the issuance of air-raid warnings and the operation of our defensive forces.

After several years of study, a definite plan and program for the establishment of an aircraft warning and control system in the United States and Alaska has now been finalized by the Air Force, and reviewed and approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense. This proposed legislation would authorize the National Military Establishment to implement the plan.

The basic active defense weapon for any large area such as the United States is the fighter airplane, because of its tactical mobility and radius of action. Antiaircraft artillery, barrage balloons, rockets, and similar weapons are employed in local defense of selected installations and localities. This employment serves to increase the effectiveness of the over-all air defense, but primary reliance for the over-all air defense of large areas must be placed in fighter aircraft. For this reason, the first consideration in organizing an aircraft warning and control system for the United States is to meet the requirements for fighter defense.

Fighters may be moved quickly to meet changing situations, but an aircraft-warning system is relatively fixed and immobile. We must, therefore, provide an aircraft-warning service in those areas in which it appears likely that we may be required to deploy fighters. The establishment of an aircraft warning service is, in effect, an "organization of the ground" to provide a capability for utilizing fighters effectively. Actual fighter deployment will depend upon the force available and the tactical situation.

Aircraft-warning requirements for fighter defense are based largely on the time-and-space relationship between friendly fighter performance, enemy aircraft performance, radar performance, geographic deployment of fighter airfields, geographic deployment of radar stations, and geographic location of the boundary of the area being defended.

With your permission, I should like to exhibit a few charts which I believe will graphically demonstrate some of the points which I would like to cover. The first chart shows these time-and-space relationships in a vertical plane. On this chart, a friendly fighter is assumed to be on ground-alert status at an airfield. This fighter is ready to take off on orders from a control center, and be navigated by ground-to-air communications to an interception. An advancing enemy aircraft is discovered by the aircraft-warning radars or spotters. During the period required for identification of the enemy, transmission of orders to the fighters to take-off, and actual take-off of the fighters, the enemy bomber advances the distance A. During this period the fighter is still at the airfield. While the fighter climbs to the enemy altitude, shown as distance B prime, the bomber advances the distance B. While the fighter is advancing the distance C prime, to the interception, the bomber advances the distance C and the interception is made. An area lying behind the point of interception and attack may be considered to be defended, while the area lying in front of this point cannot be defended by the fighter.

From this chart, it can be seen that if we could discover the enemy earlier—that is, farther out—we could intercept farther out. To do this, we could increase the power of our radars and get longer ranges, but technical characteristics of radar waves unfortunately impose limitations on radar performance.

Chart 2 illustrates the radar coverage from a ground-control-intercept radar station. The waves go out in straight lines, and the downward limit to the coverage is the line-of-sight to the horizon. As we increase the power of our radar, we can project the beam into space, beyond—but not below—the horizon. The earth's curvature produces a blank space under the beam. Aircraft following the earth's curvature would approach below the beam and not be picked up by the radar. When greater range is required at any particular altitude than can be provided by the radar, the only solution known today lies in the deployment outward of an additional radar station.

Chart 3 shows this outward deployment of the additional station to get early warning.

Chart 4 illustrates, in plane, the geographic relationship of fighter airfields, radar stations, and the defended area. On this chart, fighters on ground-alert are assumed to be at the airdrome shown. Incoming enemy aircraft are discovered by the radars on the blue line shown as "Outer limit of aircraft warning." Under these conditions, ground-alert fighters could intercept incoming enemy aircraft along the red line shown as the "Line of interception." The area behind this line could be called the defended area, while the area lying in front of this line is not provided fighter defense.

The next chart (chart 5) shows the same deployment of radar stations and fighter airfields, and the same line of interception. In addition, a vital target requiring fighter defense is assumed to lie outside the defended area. Under these assumed conditions, an additional radar deployed as shown would extend the radar cover. This would move the line of interception outward, and the vital target could be given fighter defense. Another solution would be to build a new fighter airfield near the vital target and deploy additional fighters on it. This solution is expensive both in construction and in fighters, and we try to meet our requirements by radar deployment. The deployment of radar stations in the aircraft-warning plan for the United States has been based on the full utilization of available airfields.

As we deploy our radars, we must establish control centers, into which the information provided by the radars is transmitted and from which we exercise tactical control over our defensive means—fighters and antiaircraft artillery. Chart 6 shows the communications about such a center. Here we have lines to radar stations for information and control; lines to civil, Air Force, and Navy airfields for operational control of fighters; lines to local antiaircraft artillery defenses for information and operational control; lines to CAA traffic-control centers for movement liaison and control; lines to adjacent and higher headquarters for command and coordination; lines to local military commands for air-raid warning and other purposes; lines to local civil-defense agencies for air-raid warning; and off-shore radio liaison for coordination with naval ships and forces at sea, all radiating from a control center when appropriate. In certain areas, some of these may be omitted, and the principal function of a control center may be to issue air-raid warnings. Nevertheless, the control center is the point from which all air-defense operations are controlled and directed for the given area. It is the command post of the area air-defense commander.

The entire United States must be organized into air-defense areas to enable us to conduct an effective air defense. This area organization is shown on chart 7. The entire United States is being divided into eight air-defense areas, for peacetime and initial operations in war. The red lines show the boundaries of the eight initial areas. Upon mobilization of the Air National Guard, the eight original areas will be subdivided as shown by the blue lines, to make a total of 20 air-defense areas, covering the whole United States. Each of these areas will be under the command of an area air-defense commander whose command post is a control center. The red stars show the control centers to be brought into operation by the Air National Guard a few days after mobilization. The combined star and dot at Albuquerque indicates that a cadre of Air Force personnel will man the center at all times until the Air National Guard unit at Albuquerque can be mobilized and made operational. Of the 12 control centers to e manned by the Air National Guard, 10 are used as peacetime training stations at the home of the unit. Two centers will have to be manned by National Guard units from other areas. These two must e constructed in advance and ready to receive the National Guard nits. These, plus the eight initial centers, make up the 10 centers in ur current construction program.

Chart 8 shows the chain of command from the Air Defense Command to the control centers. The commander of the eastern and western air defenses, respectively, will be charged with coordination with eastern and western sea frontier commanders and with appropriate United States Army commanders in matters of mutual interest concerning air defense. It is planned that the commanders of the three services will have a common information center—in the East and the West—where the air, ground, and sea situation, and the status of all forces can be displayed for the common information; and where operational coordination appropriate to that level may be achieved. Considerable progress has already been made in setting up these information centers, largely due to the initiative and efforts of the eastern and western sea frontier commanders. By coordination at these information centers Navy aircraft ashore may be made available to the operational control of the appropriate area air-defense commander; and Air Force aircraft on suitably located bases may be made available to the operational control of the appropriate naval antisubmarine warfare commander. Allocations would be made at this level, but actual operational control of all forces operating in air defense would be exercised from a control center.

Mr. Chairman, this concludes the principles upon which this is based. We would appreciate the opportunity of presenting some additional information which is classified, at the committee's convenience, but before doing so, we would like for the committee to hear a statement prepared for presentation in the open session by Col. Verne J. McCaul, United States Marine Corps, representing the Department of the Navy, and by Colonel Ekman, representing the Department of the Army.

Mr. DURHAM. Colonel, are you prepared to make your statement this morning?

Colonel MCCAUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Is it just a general statement?

Colonel MCCAUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. All right; you may proceed with your statement.

STATEMENT BY COL. V. J. McCAUL, UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

Colonel MCCAUL. I am authorized by the Office of Chief of Naval Operations to make the following statement, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee:

The proposed legislation which would authorize the development of a land-based aircraft control and warning system for the continental United States and Alaska is considered to be of high priority, particularly in view of the amount of time required to accomplish the permanent installation of certain radar equipments. It should be emphasized that an aircraft control and warning system does not in itself provide air defense, but is the primary and indispensable means by which air-defense weapons may be directed to their targets.

Digitized by Google

Without essential land-based aircraft control and warning facilities in being, and fully operational, the Department of the Air Force cannot hope to discharge is primary responsibility for the air defense of the United States. Nor can the forces, including naval air forces, which the Department of the Navy is charged with furnishing in defense of the United States against air attack be utilized with maximum effectiveness unless employed in conjunction with the land-based air-defense system. The proposed aircraft control and warning system is considered necessary from the standpoint of national security, and while certain essential naval components thereof have, through action of the Bureau of the Budget, been excluded from the Navy's 1950 building program, the proposed system will nevertheless facilitate development of tactics and techniques for joint employment of available forces and equipment in the air defense of the United States. The Department of the Navy desires to support the legislation which has been proposed by the Department of the Air Force.

I desire to call attention to the fact that there has been insufficient time to obtain advice from the Bureau of the Budget as to the relationship of this statement to the program of the President.

That completes my statement, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to introduce Lt. Col. William E. Ekman.

Mr. DURHAM. Colonel, you may proceed with your statement. Who are you representing, the Army?

Colonel Ekman. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Proceed.

STATEMENT BY LT. COL. WILLIAM E. EKMAN, DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

Colonel EKMAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appear before you as the representative of the Department of the Army in regard to the proposed bill presently under consideration which would authorize the Department of the Air Force to establish aircraft warning and control facilities considered essential to the security of the United States.

Representatives of the Department of the Army have collaborated with the Department of the Air Force in considering the requirements for and the scope of the proposed aircraft warning and control system and are of the opinion that the early establishment thereof is in the interest of the national security. Early approval of the legislation under consideration is required in order to permit the Department of the Air Force to obtain and construct those facilities and installations required for the establishment of the proposed system.

The Department of the Army has studied all aspects of the problem facing the National Military Establishment in fulfilling its responsibilities for the air defense of the United States and agrees that the Air Force program for the establishment of an aircraft warning and control system is an essential element in the fulfillment of those responsbilities.

That concludes the statement, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Thank you very much.

Now, General Fairchild, you were the first witness and read your statement first. There are probably some questions that some of the committee members would like to ask you. If any of those questions are questions that bear on security, why you can say so and we can have them answered later.

I understand from your statement that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and those on the highest level have agreed that carrying out this function of national defense shall be the responsibility of the Air Force.

General FAIRCHILD. That is correct, sir, and in addition that agreement has been approved by the Secretary of Defense and issued by him at the direction of the President.

Mr. DURHAM. Now, are there any questions by the committee for General Fairchild?

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Ahrends.

Mr. ARENDS. I would like to ask you just one question: At the present time is there no coordinated plan of air warning defense in the United States?

General FAIRCHILD. There is a coordinated plan which utilizes such facilities as are available to us.

Mr. ARENDS. But it is extremely limited, is that it?

General FAIRCHILD. That is correct, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. Then let me ask another question: Are the expenditures for which this authorization is sought outside the budget? That is, the request for funds which this authorization would set up would be outside the present budget, would it not? I mean, this has not been cleared with the Budget?

Mr. DURHAM. It has been cleared by the Budget.

Mr. ARENDS. It has been cleared? I didn't see that. All right, the chairman says it has been cleared.

I was talking about this year's budget——

General Saville. Sir, may I make a statement in an attempt to answer that?

Mr. ARENDS. Yes, General.

General SAVILLE. Within the limitations that were imposed on the armed services——

Mr. ARENDS. That is what I wanted to know.

General SAVILLE. This figure has been in since the beginning. It has withstood every cut by the armed services. The money is impounded in some fashion unknown to me at the moment, but I think the statement is yes, that it has been included in those budget estimates.

There is one exception to that, sir, and it is that in an effort to get on with this program rapidly part of the money needed has already been diverted by the Air Force from past appropriations—that is, as much as could be legally diverted—and second, the balance of the money is contained in the supplemental. There is a supplemental appropriation—1949—in which part of it was contained.

One other thing, sir. The picket vessels—the four picket vessels that were in the program—are now not reflected in the current budget.

Mr. ARENDS. According to this testimony, the over-all cost would be an approximate $85,000,000?

General SAVILLE. That is for construction, sir. That is not equipment.

Mr. ARENDS. That is not equipment?

General SAVILLE. No, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ARENDS. Do you have the figure—an estimate—on complete cost?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. Can you give it to us?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. There is approximately $85,500,000 for construction, real estate, and things of that order. There is approximately $26,000,000 for equipment, communications facilities, and things of that nature. There was $7,000,000 for the picket vessels which has been eliminated. It is not in current budgets.

Mr. DURHAM. Who eliminated that, the Budget Bureau.

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Colonel MCCAUL. The Bureau of the Budget; yes, sir. They were eliminated from——

Mr. DURHAM. For what reason? Can you give us that?

COLONEL MCCAUL. Well, general economy, I believe, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. General economy?

Colonel MCCAUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. You may proceed, General.

General SAVILLE. There is a sum of approximately $46,000,000 which represents equipment and things of that nature that has been procured over past years, including during the war and things of that kind, which would be employed in the system.

The best over-all figure that could be given would be $161,000,000, exclusive of personnel costs, over-all—for everything—and that includes the picket vessels.

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly you have a lot of equipment that you carried over from the last World War that can be used in this whole program; is that correct?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. What is your estimate on the value of that at the present time?

General SAVILLE. $42,250,000, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. In other words, you have already made an investment of $42,000,000 or more on this program, which has already been spent for equipment on hand?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. That is in terms of equipment but not in terms of the construction required to deploy that equipment to form a system.

Mr. DURHAM. Now, on your plan there, that you outlined before us—the air defense areas—can you tell us at the present time what period of completion does that stand at today?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. With the background of the material that you have on hand.

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. It is 2 out of 20.

Mr. DURHAM. Two out of twenty?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Only two?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. These are left over installations from the war. We have this one here [indicating] and we have this one here [indicating].

Mr. DURHAM. Well, when this is finally completed, do you feel that it would give complete protection as far as being able to provide warning sufficient to protect our national defense? Could they get through or would it be possible for them to get through, without our first being able to find them?

General SAVILLE. Sir, the only answer I can give to that is that there is no known technical means of providing absolute security or absolute warning—none of any kind. These things are relative only.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, based on former experience, of course, with the scope of your air defense from radar, you have been able to work out a fairly accurate idea as to how much this would cover. That is the way you planned this thing, I suppose?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. And this been considered by intelligence agencies looking at our strategic make-up from an enemy's point of view.

One of the items I think, sir, that is important is the fact that this is in balance. What we are doing here is in balance with what we are doing in other armed forces projects. And that was one of the concerns of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: To see that these things were all in balance.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, if you recall, this bill, of course, calls for offshore defense responsibilities also. Now, is that a question that you don't care to answer here at the present time? At the present time you are not operating off shore, or are you operating off shore?

General SAVILLE. No, sir; we are not operating any radar installations as part of the aircraft warning system for the United States today that are off shore. Such installations are in the program.

Mr. DURHAM. The whole idea of this defense command by radar will be projected out as far as possible and as far as we can make commitments?

General SAVILLE. I think, sir, as far as practicable, because it is an economic balance that controls. It is a technical point on the one hand—on that two-notch deployment which is what you require—and it is a question then of do you do it every place or don't you do it every place.

I think, sir, that that would be covered in the executive session when we show exactly where the coverage is and is not.

Mr. DURHAM. Are there any questions on this?

Mr. FISHER. May I ask a question?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Fisher.

Mr. FISHER. You referred to Alaska, General, and I assume that is a very strategic spot so far as preparedness against attack on this country is concerned?

General SAVILLE. It is a strategic spot, sir.

Mr. FISHER. Can you enlarge in the open hearing here on the importance and pressing need for better radar facilities in Alaska?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. I think that the problem in Alaska is essentially identical or comparable to the problem in the United States, with the additional factor of its geographic location and its isolation. On the one hand Alaska is an outpost and the United States is our zone of interior. This is where our war-making capacity exists. In that aspect Alaska might be considered as less important than the United States. On the other hand, its geographic location gives it a strategic importance that is not equaled by any of the geography that is in the United States.

Digitized by Google

Mr. FISHER. Oh, yes, I understand. But from the standpoint of possible attack, Alaska is of extreme importance, isn't it?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FISHER. From the standpoint of preparing for a possible attack.

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FISHER. Can you go into the matter of the inadequacy of radar facilities there?

General SAVILLE. Only to state, sir, that the radar facilities currently there are totally and wholly inadequte.

Mr. FISHER. Yes. Your plans included in this $85,000,000 request, I assume, include the Alaskan situation?

General SAVILLE. That is correct, sir.

Mr. FISHER. It happens that I was there this past October, and I know from talking to General Twining and General Armstrong and others that they regard the need for radar facilities of highest importance. Of course, you are familiar with that.

General SAVILLE. We share their view exactly, sir.

Mr. FISHER. I believe that is all.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Havenner.

Mr. HAVENNER. Can you tell us at this time, General, how these air-defense areas in the continental United States were defined? On what basis were they set up, with those bounds?

General SAVILLE. They were set up generally on two bases; one of them was the requirements for the defense of the geographic area that was included in it, and the second one was the control over that portion of the forces that would likely be deployed in that area. Considered with that second factor is the factor of the enemy's capabilities.

I might say that those areas are drawn there with the tactical considerations of air defense in mind and have no other purpose excepting that one military-civil job. This is not a compromise with anything, in other words.

Mr. HAVENNER. You would be prepared to explain to the committee in more detail later, at perhaps some closed hearing, what the significance of those areas is from a geographical and territorial standpoint, from the standpoint of the areas involved?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir, in detail.

Mr. HAVENNER. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. Any further questions of General Saville?

(No response.)

Mr. DURHAM. Now, General Saville, I would conclude from your statement there as to the completion of the radar network at the present time you consider it very hazardous so far as protection is standing at the present time or as it stands today?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. It is not in very good shape?

General SAVILLE. Words would be impossible to describe how poor it is, Mr. Chairman. It is almost negligible.

Mr. DURHAM. At the present time these responsibilities are not laid down by law, in statutory authority, for any department of the defense; is that correct?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. I believe it to be generally correct, sir. The authorities stem from the National Security Act of 1947.

Mr. DURHAM. You have proceeded under that authority with what you have done so far?

General SAVILLE. That has been amplified then by the mutual agreement by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and concurred in by them, approved by the Secretary of Defense and issued by the Secretary of Defense as an authoritative directive by direction of the President. That is the fundamental authority today, as I understand it, for what we might call roles and missions.

I would like to say just one thing, sir. With respect to this program, we have been working in the closest possible coordination with the Army and with the Navy. There is no evidence of any kind of any interservice question with respect to this that I am aware of. It has been technical problems and not responsibility problems.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, today what kind of a research staff have you in the Air Force to carry out such program as this? Do you have the technical personnel, provided such a program was adopted?

General SAVILLE. The National Military Establishment through the Research and Development Board and through the various technical agencies, considers air defense as only one tactical function to be performed. I think that the technical agencies that are available, sir, are we might say essentially as food as the country can provide.

Mr. DURHAM. General, I did not ask you your background, but you might state to the committee just what your background is. You seem to be the expert on this.

General SAVILLE. With respect to this?

Mr. DURHAM. With respect to your training, education, and so on.

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. I will give it to you as it bears on this particular problem.

I was an instructor of fighter aviation in the Air Corps Tactical School at Maxwell Field in 1932, when I began to specialize in this. We developed there the first ground observer and aircraft warning control system that there was developed, to my knowledge, in the world.

I then stayed on as a member of the Air Force Board, devoting my attention to air defense and matters of that kind.

I went from there to the Command and Staff School.

I went to the Office of the Chief of Air Corps, where I served as an Assistant Chief in the Plans Division.

I went from there as executive officer of the First Air Defense Command, that was set up as an experimental agency in the United States. While there I was over in England and participated in the Battle of Britain, where I was observing the operation of their system.

I then was called back to the United States where I was appointed Director of Air Defense in the Office of the Chief of Air Corps, in which capacity I was responsible for all of the Air Corps' fighter training, aircraft warning development, and things of that kind in World War II.

After we got organized, I went over to the Mediterranean theater, where I commanded the Twelfth Tactical Air Command in north Africa. Its job was an air defense job of the entire coast of north Africa.

Digitized by Google

I was Chief of Staff to Air Marshal Tedder, who was Air Officer Commander in Chief of the entire theater.

I left that to command the Twelfth Tactical Air Command in Italy and I participated in the ground support mission there.

I was the air task force commander for the invasion of southern France.

And I ended my active war service as commanding general of the First Tactical Air Force.

Mr. DURHAM. General, I think you are well qualified to talk to us on the subject.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Arends.

Mr. ARENDS. General, would you care to state—on or off the record—how long you think it would take to perfect such an organization as set up, or equip the whole thing and get it going? You can state it either on or off the record if you care.

General SAVILLE. I would like to state that off the record if I may, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. Off the record? All right.

Mr. DURHAM. General, at the present time are you prepared to make any statement on the production rates of the planes that are being built for this type of service, or would that have to come from some other man in the Air Force? Could you give us a brief outline at the present time as to your production of planes? Are you producing planes for this type of work that you have outlined to us here?

General SAVILLE. The answer is "yes," sir. As to the exact rates—specific rates—I do not have that information available here, sir. I have a generalized picture of what it is. We can get that information for you. I can also state that the aircraft picture is in general consonance with the proposal here, which is a mechanical means of utilizing in effect the full capabilities of the aircraft that are programed and being produced.

Mr. DURHAM. Do we put radar on all planes today?

General SAVILLE. No, sir; we do not.

Mr. DURHAM. We do not.

General SAVILLE. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Primarily, what type of plane do we use it on? If that is off the record, why, leave it off.

General SAVILLE. No, sir; I think that can be answered. We have an airplane for this type of purpose under discussion here that is called an all-weather fighter. That does have radar in it in order to have vision, effective vision, when the pilots can't see.

I might say that future aircraft, when we get—when it is technically possible—interceptor aircraft, will have radar in them, according to our plans.

Mr. DURHAM. During the last World War did you have anything to do with the procurement of this radar equipment for our services?

General SAVILLE. Not directly, sir. I was in the operational side. I had to do with numbers and with deployment. The procurement side; no, sir. That was done by the Signal Corps.

Mr. DURHAM. Anyone else have a question?

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Havenner.

Mr. HAVENNER. Can you tell us, without violating any of the security requirements, whether there is any plan for coordination between the air defense system of the United States and the air defense system of Canada, or Mexico, or both?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. On the record I would like to say that the air defense command of the United States and the air defense command of Canada at that level enjoy the most splendid cooperation and coordination, sir. I might even say perfect.

Mr. DURHAM. Does that apply to all countries?

General SAVILLE. In our system, sir, we have not had occasion to go beyond the attempt to get close coordination with Canada.

Mr. DURHAM. Any further questions? Mr. Doyle?

Mr. DOYLE. General, assuming that the facilities or properties proposed to be purchased and developed under this bill, if authorized, were now in being, what would be the estimated annual cost of maintaining and operating the entire system?

General SAVILLE. Including the picket vessels, sir, and excluding personnel costs, which we have not computed, it would be, according to our best estimates, $11,450,000 annually.

Mr. DOYLE. Would that estimate include any normal expansion in peacetime?

General SAVILLE. No, sir.

Mr. DOYLE. I mean, would you have to add materially to the annual overhead?

General SAVILLE. There would have to be added to the annual overhead the nonsystematic replacement of the equipment with more modern equipment as it came out. We have no way, frankly, of estimating that, because it is in the hands of the scientists as to how fast they are going to move.

So we have included in this $11,450,000 only those things that we can measure or have any kind of a firm basis on, sir.

Mr. DOYLE. I notice on the chart there, of course, Alaska and the Aleutian area is included, but what division of the 20 is that included in—or is that a separate unit?

General SAVILLE. Sir, with your permission, we have for the off-the-record presentation——

Mr. DOYLE. I see.

General SAVILLE. The complete coverage and the plan for that.

Mr. DOYLE. General, you will understand my particular interest, possibly, in Alaska and the Aleutians when I say my own son in his lifetime in this war was a first lieutenant in the Aleutian Air Force—with the Army Air Force—and he told me before he was killed of the great benefit radar was to him as a pilot in the Aleutian campaigns.

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. I would like to say, sir, that the installation of radar in the Aleutian chain was probably the most difficult technical job that the development of radar confronted any place in the world in World War II. I am confident that the application of radar was certainly one of the main reasons why the Battle of Britain was won and not lost and was directly responsible for saving thousands and thousands and thousands of lives. It was unfortunate that we did not have a system in being. We believe that system in being is an essential to our national security.

Mr. DOYLE. General, do you believe this program as outlined by you at the present time is flexible enough in case of an emergency to expand it to the point where you would like to expand it in case of an emergency?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

I would like to state that in designing this program there are certain difficulties. One of them is that we have to go out and put a piece of apparatus at a fixed installation. We do not want to go and then abandon that installation and go off some place else and go through that kind of foolishness. So we have very carefully considered in this deployment its expansion capabilities in war for one and two the future of the system as far as any of us can see.

We think that what we are providing here is the minimum required under the conditions now obtaining and is a perfectly sound framework for expansion in war.

Mr. DURHAM. What would you say as to what percentage or how far do you think this has come since your first experience with radar? Do you feel that there has been vast improvement made in this field even since the war? You should be able to know. You followed this question very closey

General SAVILLE. I think the word "vast" since the war indicates a degree that is not applicable. There have been material ones. Unfortunately, the rate of radar development has not for this application kept pace with other avenues. That is partly due to the inherent technical limitations in the radar.

We believe that the program, sir, for development as considered by the military and scientific agencies is sound and represents potential material development.

Mr. DURHAM. What has happened to the industries that were in this line of business? Were they more or less converted to some other type? Have they lost their technical personnel—any of it—during this interim period? Or have we missed the gun here and should we have done it in 1946?

General SAVILLE. No; I think the thing is the scientists are back up against basic problems that are not easy to solve and they have had to pursue different lines which are relatively slow. I don't believe that there is a fault attributable to any one thing. I think it is the position we have found ourselves in.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you think you now have the materials necessary to make up such an organization as you plan? Are you satisfied with that?

General SAVILLE. "Satisfied," sir, is a little too strong. We can effectively utilize to material advantage the equipment that we have available. If there were no limitation whatsoever, we would naturally not employ equipment we had left over from the World War.

Mr. DURHAM. Could you complete such a program and carry it out in a 2-year period?

General SAVILLE. With new equipment?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes.

General SAVILLE. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. How long would it take to carry out such a program?

General SAVILLE. In wartime?

Mr. DURHAM. Right now. I hope we are not going to be in a war.

General SAVILLE. May I answer that off the record?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, General.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Arends.

Mr. ARENDS. General, this question pops in my mind. We read in the paper about jet-propelled bombers that skim across the United States at speeds over 600 miles an hour. They cover several thousand miles in a few hours. What can you do with radar with respect to detecting an enemy bomber with a speed capacity like that? Can you do something about intercepting something like that? If they move that fast, can you pick them up?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir. Fortunately our job is not the defense of the United States against our own equipment.

Mr. ARENDS. No.

General SAVILLE. If it were, our job would be naturally more difficult than it is now. There is that point.

Second, any system where the elements are all integrated together, which is applicable to the kind of a national fabric that we have, is more effective than these local island defense businesses. So that our own problem is not—it is impossible of absolute solution, but it is more practicable to solve our problem better than it would be for some of the other people of the world, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. I thought that would present a problem. I did not know.

General SAVILLE. Oh, it does. It presents difficult technical problems to us in terms of these high altitudes and high speeds. Those do not arrive at a point where they present a bar and say "ineffective hereafter" in our case and in our problems.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Doyle.

Mr. DOYLE. General, I am interested in what extent, if any, technical schools, the university laboratories, and private engineering organizations have already contributed to the knowledge of the Army, Navy, and Air Force in this field of radar. Are they actively functioning with you in coordination with your efforts?

General SAVILLE. There is tremendous activity, sir, and without it we would be lost. The best scientific brains in the country are working on this with us.

Mr. DOYLE. Are they working under some arrangement or some authorization whereby they are being paid for working on it?

General SAVILLE. I think, in general, they are working two ways. One is through the agency of the Research and Development Board and the other is through contractual arrangements that are made between the respective services and these concerns to take on certain development and research projects and problems.

The third system, which I temporarily omitted, is that internally within the Air Force, we have operational analysts who are civilian scientific technicians who come internally in the system and give it an objective look without any of the obligations of rank and so on that go with a uniform. That is most helpful.

Mr. DOYLE. Do you feel the Air Forces are obtaining adequate cooperation and aid from the civilian experts in the field? I mean are we adequately encouraging that end of the development of radar?

General SAVILLE. I can't answer that question very well, sir, overall from the field of air defense and our peculiar things. I believe it is superior coordination and helpfulness that we are getting in that general field. I believe that the lines of development, that are now being pursued, and the lines of study are sound and correct insofar as we can see.

We do not know of any bets we are overlooking, sir.

Mr. DOYLE. In the field of the Reserve Air Force and the National Guard Air Force, are they also coordinated with the active Air Force in this field?

General SAVILLE. As to the plan, they are very closely coordinated. As a matter of fact, the manning of our establishments is predicated upon the utilization of the reserve components to the maximum practicable to do the job and the using of regular troops only to the extent necessary to get the job done they can't do. They are not there on H-hour or D-day and things of that kind, but the whole philosophy is to use them to the maximum and not maintain and pay for day after day an enormous thing in being any larger than it has to be.

Mr. DOYLE. I say, General, the background of that question was, I had the pleasure of visiting the National Guard air unit in my own State of California when I came back. They were disappointed that they were not more promptly getting equipment and facilities in this field of radar study. Why is that? Why isn't adequate equipment available to the National Guard air unit so the boys have something they feel satisfied in working with instead of, for instance, making their own little pieces of equipment as I saw them doing?

General SAVILLE. There is a shortage of modern radar equipment. It is very expensive.

We have in this current plan and in conjunction with it provided modern radar equipment that is scheduled to go to those units. We do not believe that prior to the finalization of this plan that the situation was as healthy as it might be. We believe that the implementation of this whole plan has considered that and will materially improve that situation, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Any other questions? Mr. Havenner? Mr. Fisher?

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. DURHAM. General, we thank you very much for coming up here this morning and giving us this statement.

If there are no further questions, the committee will adjourn until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock to hear the three services in executive session on what they know about radar. We will hear what information they can give us.

We may have to call you back at a later date, General. We are going to hear you in executive session too.

General SAVILLE. Today, sir?

Mr. DURHAM. No, not today. We have some work here we have got to do this morning and we will call you back into executive session at a later date.

(Whereupon, at 11:20 a. m., the subcommittee adjourned.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
DURHAM SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE,
Saturday, February 12, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., the Honorable Carl T. Durham (chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee will come to order.

General Saville, I believe yesterday when we closed the meeting we planned to take up this morning the matter of housing; the accommodations in connection with this program, and the cost of it. Will you go into that matter and give it to us?

STATEMENT OF GEN. GORDON P. SAVILLE—Resumed

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to show the committee just a brief plat plan of each kind of installation so the committee will know what the order of things is.

Mr. DURHAM. I would like to look at it.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. DURHAM. That cost covers everything?

General SAVILLE. Not the basic radar equipment itself, sir, but it does include all the housing construction, the barracks, the buildings, and things of that kind, and the cost is exclusive of the land itself. It does not include the access roads.

(Discussion off the record.)

General SAVILLE. These are typical, sir, and this is the area control center shown by the dots on the map in the first hearing.

Mr. DURHAM. How many of these control centers do you have to have in this entire program?

General SAVILLE. In the continental United States we have 10.

Mr. DURHAM. Who made these estimates of the cost of this? Were these estimates made by the Engineer Corps of the Army?

General SAVILLE. They were made by the air defense command staff and checked for general accuracy by the air installations staff. They were made, in the first instance, by the Engineer Corps officers who are on the staff of the air defense command. They were then checked by the air installations people and the estimates have been generally checked by the Office of the Chief of Engineers, who finds if they are generally in order.

The status of this at the moment is that the detailed drawings are in the process of preparation by the Chief of Engineers. It is impracticable to get a firm estimate until after those drawings are completed.

Mr. DURHAM. That includes housing for all the personnel assigned there?

General SAVILLE. Yes, except that these are operational installations. We provide no family housing of any kind at any of these installations.

Mr. DURHAM. You do not permit families on the sites?

General SAVILLE. No, sir. Dependents are not permitted on the sites.

Mr. DURHAM. You may proceed.

Mr. BROWN. You said that there would be 10 control centers constructed. I was under the impression there would be 20.

General SAVILLE. Yes. In the first meeting, if you will recall, there were eight Regular Air Force control centers that were put in for the eight original areas, plus two that had to be provided outside of this program because the National Guard had to come to those points from other places. The other installations making up the 20, the difference between the 10 and the 20, are training installations that are conducted under the National Guard training program.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROWN. They do not have centers?

General SAVILLE. Not of this type. They have centers based on training requirements rather than operational requirements.

One point on which I think that I might have left a misunderstanding: These figures that I have given are the manning figures that we propose to man with. At these stations that we are putting up we provide housing facilities on a minimum basis—and I am speaking of barracks, and so on—for the operating strength that would be required to operate the station if it were in full operation.

If you wish the exact number for which facilities are provided, I will have to get those added up, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. I think that we would like to have those, General. Give us the total personnel, the officer strength required and the enlisted personnel.

General SAVILLE. For which facilities are provided?

Mr. DURHAM. That is right.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. DURHAM. The entire program will have how many officers and enlisted personnel?

General SAVILLE. The over-all program calls for 9,399 Air Force, Regular Air Force personnel, and 13,200 National Guard, or a Reserve component personnel not on active duty.

Mr. DURHAM. How about your enlisted personnel? Do you not use the enlisted personnel of the National Guard also?

General SAVILLE. Yes, they come in as units; they would not come as individuals.

Mr. DURHAM. Have you done any training with the National Guard units?

General SAVILLE. Yes, we have done some, but we have not done very much. This is just getting organized, the National Guard program, and the Reserve program.

Mr. DURHAM. The plans are to train those National Guard units just as rapidly as possible when you get this program into being?

General SAVILLE. Yes; we have a plan for this present summer encampment for those National Guard units that have advanced in their individual training to a point where they can be given operational training. They will be trained in this operational system starting this summer.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you have a figure there broken down as to the cost of these housing units, the cost of housing at these stations?

General SAVILLE. Yes.

Mr. DURHAM. I would like that placed in the record.

General SAVILLE. The total estimated cost of the entire construction is $58,141,100.

Mr. DURHAM. Just what does that include? That includes everything; does it not?

General SAVILLE. Yes; all the construction at all these sites.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you have a break-down as to the station costs—the housing, public facilities, and so forth?

General SAVILLE. Yes; we have a complete break-down in any particular aspect that you might want.

Mr. DURHAM. If you do not have it this morning, you can place it in the record.

General SAVILLE. Off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

General SAVILLE. We have prepared what we could on the criteria used on an unclassified form, taking what might be considered as classified.

This covers in general the criteria or the standards upon which this construction is based.

Mr. DURHAM. Can that go into the record?

General SAVILLE. Yes.

1. In arriving at the estimated cost of the construction involved in the installation of the aircraft control and warning system in the continental United States, the following criteria were employed:

(a) General policy: In general construction should provide for minimum essentials consistent with operational requirements. The general policy will be to provide the necessary required facilities with a maximum over-all economy consistent with functional requirements, reasonable comfort, and sound architectural and engineering practice. Materials and construction methods will be utilized which will result in the lowest total costs, including both original and maintenance costs, for a life expectancy of 15 years.

(b) Modified mobilization type construction: All buildings at all A. C. and W. installations should be of modified mobilization type construction. Mobilization-cantonment-type construction will be modified to provide the following improvements:

(1) Concrete, cement-block, or cinder-block walls: acceptable alternates will be standard-wood-frame-sheathed walls with cement asbestos shingles, where warranted by local conditions.

(2) Asphalt shingle or built-up roofs.

(3) All interior walls of troop facilities to be sheathed with plasterboard and painted.

(4) All concrete floors except in service areas to be covered with linoleum, asphalt tile or rubber tile floor covering.

I might interject there to say the basis for this is the minimum that we believe we can hold our troops there without having them say, "Well, I just am not going to stay in the service." It is economy, on the one hand, and minimum housing facilities on the other. We cannot retain troops in peacetime in the barracks buildings which we did in wartime. You just cannot do it.

No special buildings will be provided for dispensaries or sub-PX facilities at the smaller installations. Space for these facilities will be provided in other buildings. Dispensary facilities will be located in other buildings at larger installations. Consideration will be given to the provision of a dispensary building at the air defense control centers. This consideration will be based upon the availability of this service from possible adjacent installations. Dispensary facilities at the control centers will be constructed only after individual justification and the approval of this headquarters for each site.

(c) Camouflage: Extensive and costly camouflage will not be provided.

(d) Central heating plants will be provided at all A. C. & W. sites in order to keep housekeeping personnel at a minimum and to increase efficiency. A separate heating system should be provided where economically desirable in buildings which are apart from the main camp-site area, such as radio transmitter and receiver buildings.

Digitized by Google

3. Utilities: Optimum use will be made of public-utility services such as water supply, electric-power supply, gas supply, sewage and waste disposal, or other utility services required. At sites remotely located from public-utility services where it is impossible or not economically feasible to make use of these services, adequate electric power, water supply, and sewage-disposal facilities will be provided by the constructing agency. Utilities capacities, initially provided for smaller installations will be sufficient to care for an increase in population up to a total of war strength.

(f) Stand-by equipment: Stand-by Diesel-driven electric generators of a capacity sufficient to permit full and continuous operation of all vital elements of the installation will be provided. Generators will be furnished by the constructing agency. The size and functional lay-out of the various type power buildings will be obtained from the Watson Laboratories of the Air Matériel Command through contact with the Continental Air Command.

(g) Utilization of existing facilities: Maximum use will be made of structures and utilities which may exist at sites chosen for A. C. & W. stations where they meet the criteria prescribed, provided that such use will result in over-all economy and efficiency for the planned life expectancy.

(h) Space allowances: Troop housing and related facilities will be based upon the space allowances as set forth in WD Memo 210–20–7, Oct. 9, 1947, insofar as practicable. Dependent family housing will not be provided. At isolated stations, troop housing and bachelor quarters will be provided for all assigned and attached personnel. At all others, housing will be provided for all assigned and attached enlisted men, grades 4 through 7, and bachelor quarters will be provided for 50 percent of the assigned and attached officers and noncommissioned officers, grades 1 through 3. Individual accommodations within the bachelor quarters will normally be as follows:

(1) Officers, 240 square feet (two rooms in a standard BOQ) (provides 120 square feet for 100 percent officer strength).

(2) NCO's grades 1, 2, 3, 120 square feet (one room in a standard BOQ).

(i) Security: The entire area should be enclosed by a six-foot manproof fence with four-strand double-apron barbed-wire top.

(j) Roads: Required access roads to and service roads within the site area will be two-lane, class C highways, designed for traffic consisting principally of passenger cars and light trucks, 2½ tons or less, with an occasional vehicle having a wheel load equal but not exceeding 9,000 pounds.

Mr. DURHAM. Any questions?

Mr. DOYLE. Do I gather then that the nature of the housing in these isolated stations particularly has a direct relationship to your being able to hire trained men and keep them on the job at those stations?

General SAVILLE. Yes; I would say that the primary problem is that just in keeping competent people of having proper housing.

Mr. DOYLE. Then do I understand that the Congress must realize that, in proportion as you are able to provide reasonably satisfactory housing, just in that proportion will you be able to keep in the armed services, at least in this branch of the service, the high type of experts and trained personnel required?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. Yes.

Mr. DURHAM. Most of these boys are above high school; are they not?

General SAVILLE. Yes; a great many of them we have now have had some college, but the average, just the average American citizen today just will not and you cannot expect them to live in anything except adequate housing.

Mr. DOYLE. May I ask one other question: In these isolated stations, you do not expect to have men with their families?

General SAVILLE. Not on these stations. And at these stations we do not propose to make provision for military family housing. We try to locate them where they can have their families in the vicinity.

Mr. DURHAM. What else have you say, General?

General SAVILLE. I have nothing particular. I have a detailed break-down of the entire cost of each building.

Mr. DURHAM. Could you place that in the record?

General SAVILLE. No; these have been considered classified.

Mr. DURHAM. Suppose you leave a copy of that information with the committee.

General SAVILLE. With your permission, sir, I would like to give you a preliminary copy of the restricted document, which gives the estimated cost of the individual housing on the different types of sites, with the total cost divided by number of people.

Another is the complete break-down of the detailed costs for the different housing.

Another is the detailed estimates for the Alaska construction. All of these are classified.

Mr. DURHAM. Suppose you hand them to the clerk, and the clerk will take care of that part of it.

General SAVILLE. Yes.

Mr. DOYLE. May I ask one other question?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes.

Mr. DOYLE. Over how long a period of time, General Saville, has the staff been working on the project you gave to the committee this morning and yesterday?

General SAVILLE. I would say that this plan has been under active, really active investigation for approximately 2 years.

Mr. DURHAM. General, with respect to each of these projects, can you tell us exactly how that will be treated; will they be farmed out to industry, or does that come under you?

General SAVILLE. Yes; we are in it because we are the ultimate consumer in the military sense.

Mr. DURHAM. If you want some improvement on something that is accepted by the Army, what mechanics have you provided for getting that project out to say the Western Electric, General Electric, or whoever does it?

General SAVILLE. The procedure starting from scratch is this: We have a military problem, and we consult with the scientific agencies and various agencies in industry, and the Research and Development Board, as well as our own technical people. And when we arrive at a meeting of the minds as between ourselves on what we want or what we can get, then we start on the job.

Mr. DURHAM. Does the Research and Development Board have the right to pass on this project; is that correct?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. Yes. This is a project, in one aspect at least, this is a military project which is primarily the responsibility of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. From the scientific aspect and the equipment aspect, the Secretary of Defense has had the opinion of the Chairman of the Research and Development Board, and also we have asked the members of the Electronic Commission and the radar people, and all of the experts their opinions with respect to this over-all program before granting approval of the program, from the over-all viewpoint.

Mr. DURHAM. And how do you proceed from there on? Do you proceed by letting contracts, or do you do it with funds which have been allotted to you by the Army or for research and development?

General SAVILLE. No; there is money appropriated by the Congress annually, has been in the past, in which provision is made for development and research, in the research and development program, item by item, that represents not only the requirements that I have referred to here, but also the technical requirements in industry. The number of these requirements always exceeds the availability of funds. Therefore, we have to arrange them in the order of priority, which is done internally within the Air Force. And having established the priority the over-all priority, then those that survive that process are taken up first.

Mr. DURHAM. In this total cost that you gave us, there is no research and development cost?

General SAVILLE. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Then would you go out and make a contract, we will say, with one of the electric concerns, Western Electric or General Electric, for the project?

General SAVILLE. None whatsoever. This is installation.

Mr. DURHAM. Of course, in problems like this, the question always arises, "Have you got the money?" Otherwise, things like this can be slowed down considerably. Have you got all of the projects and research projects you think you need at the present time in this picture, so that the whole thing can go forward?

General SAVILLE. Yes; we think that the research and development that has been proposed by the armed forces in the over-all program for this particular aspect of the project involves two questions—one is in balancing it with the over-all picture, and the second is the question of imposing limitations on the development of the project.

Mr. DURHAM. Has the Navy had funds also that it can use for this research and development work?

General SAVILLE. Oh, yes. As a matter of fact, we meet jointly to avoid duplication in fields where that is possible; and in some of the research and development that is required, both by us and by the Navy, the Navy is actually meeting the cost.

Mr. DURHAM. You are dependent up to this time entirely on industry to produce this equipment under the present system, radar and so on? You do not develop them yourselves?

General SAVILLE. No; except the very minor developments within our own laboratory.

Mr. DURHAM. Just something like that, but I am talking about the over-all plan.

General SAVILLE. Yes; we rely on industry; we work with industry but we rely on industry, as we have done in the past; and, as will past research, we have to pay, because industry itself will not pay for it.

Digitized by Google

(Off-record discussion.)

Mr. DURHAM. Any further questions?

Mr. DOYLE. Do I correctly understand you, General, in saying that industry does not bear the cost of the experimental or development; is that your observation?

General SAVILLE. Mr. Doyle, I am a little bit out of my field here, but what I mean is that if we have developed something that has military application and has no application, we will say, in the civilian economy, then we have to bear the research costs, whether they do it within their own organization, or whether it is handled on a research basis under contract; we have to pay the costs; we cannot reap the direct fruits of the general industrial research that they carry out for themselves.

Radar in this application is more or less peculiar to the military services, and therefore calls for pretty much of a fundamental and basic research development program.

Mr. DOYLE. Then actually the Government bears the cost of research, and industry gets the manufacture of the facilities after the Government pays for the development of them. Does the Government get any allowance in making the exploratory expenditures?

General SAVILLE. I really do not know; I am not in the development and research field, so I am not qualified to speak on that. I think we would be far more apt to gain from the research than industry would on those things that have peculiar application to the military service. But I am not an expert and am not qualified to speak in that field.

Mr. DURHAM. Any further questions?

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask you a question since you have referred to the use of radar: In the latter part of the war, were the so-called buzz bombs, and other familiar things that were used by the Germans in bombarding, classed by you as guided missiles?

General SAVILLE. No; they were not.

Mr. FISHER. They were not guided missiles?

General SAVILLE. They were missiles; they were projected, but there were no guided missiles.

Mr. FISHER. Did they attempt to make use of radar in trying to inform the forces so they could attack them?

General SAVILLE. Yes, against the V–1. For example, that was just another airplane; it did not have a pilot; it was just like another airplane; and I have seen some of them on the radar screen.

The V–2, on the other hand, is a different business, and it is different on account of the terrific speed at which it travels.

Mr. FISHER. They were able, however, to detect the approach of the V–2?

General SAVILLE. The V–1.

Mr. FISHER. The V–1?

General SAVILLE. Yes, the buzz bombs; the V–1 was a buzz bomb.

Mr. FISHER. And you say you were able to detect those.

General SAVILLE. You are talking about the V–1?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

General SAVILLE. Yes.

Digitized by Google

Mr. FISHER. Did they attempt to intercept them with fighters?

General SAVILLE. Yes; we shot down many of them.

Mr. FISHER. What was the experience; do you know?

General SAVILLE. No; I do not know the over-all record. I know in our own particular area where they came by we got some of them. We did not get them by ground-alerting the fighters to go up and make an interception, however; but in the area in which I was located, the battle area, we had aircraft in the air a great deal of the time, and when they were in the air we were able to shoot down quite a few of them.

Mr. FISHER. It was not possible then to dispatch the plane from the ground to intercept them?

General SAVILLE. That is correct, in the distance they had to work

Mr. DURHAM. Are there any further questions? Do you have anything else, General?

General SAVILLE. No. We will be glad to provide the committee with any information that might be helpful.

Mr. DURHAM. We appreciate the information you have given us Do you have anything, Mr. Brown?

(Off-record discussion.)

Mr. DURHAM. Are there any further questions, Mr. Doyle?

Mr. DOYLE. No further questions.

Mr. BLACKNEY. I have nothing further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. If there is no objection, the answers containing unclassified information in reply to the questions submitted to the services concerning the proposed legislation are hereby made a part of the record. If there are no further questions the clerk will proceed to read the bill.

LAND-BASED AIR CONTROL AND WARNING SYSTEM

UNCLASSIFIED ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS (FEBRUARY 7, 1949) OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

1. Why is it proposed that the authority to establish an air-warning system shall be granted to the Secretary of the Air Force rather than to the Secretary of Defense and/or the Secretaries of all Departments of the National Military Establishment?

A. The Air Force is specifically charged by agreement of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, approved by the Secretary of Defense, and by directive of the President with responsibility for the air defense of the United States.

3. (a) What are the air-defense responsibilities of the Department of the Air Force? Of the Army? Of the Navy?

Emanating from the Security Act of 1947, all services have been assigned responsibilities for air defense as follows:

(a) United States Air Force:

(1) To be responsible for defense of the United States against air attack in accordance with the policies and procedures of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

(2) To formulate joint doctrines and procedures, in coordination with the other services, for the defense of the United States against air attack, and to provide the Air Force units, facilities, and equipment required therefor.

(3) To develop, in coordination with the other services, doctrines, procedures, and equipment for air defense from land areas, including the continental United States.

(b) United States Navy:

(1) To provide sea-based air defense and the sea-based means for coordinating control for defense against air attack, coordinating with the other services in matters of joint concern.

NOTE.—The numbering of questions and answers follows that used in the original query.

Digitized by Google

(2) To provide naval (including naval air) forces as required for the defense of the United States against air attack, in accordance with joint doctrines and procedures approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

(c) United States Army:

(1) To organize, train, and equip Army antiaircraft artillery units.

(2) To provide Army forces as required for the defense of the United States against air attack, in accordance with joint doctrines and procedures approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

(b) In what law or laws or what documents, if any, are these responsibilities specifically laid down?

A Secretary of Defense paper, entitled "Functions of the Armed Forces and the Joint Chiefs of Staff," dated April 21, 1948, issued by the Secretary of Defense at the direction of the President.

4. (a) Why does the language of the bill limit the Secretary's authority to the development of "Land-based Installations and Facilities"?

Statutory authority already exists for the development and procurement of ships, planes, radars, etc., but this bill primarily permits the development of "land-based installations and facilities" in a program of such scope that statutory authority is necessary.

(b) Is there such a thing as ship-based or airborne facilities for warning of the approach of enemy aircraft?

Yes, both ship-based and airborne.

7. (a) Are any of the other services developing suitable planes and radar for employment in airborne early warning missions?

Yes, the U. S. Navy.

7. (b) If so, and if the answer to question 5 is negative, why has the Air Force decided not to pursue the development of this method also?

To avoid duplication of effort, in the assured knowledge that the Navy, in accordance with the recommendation of the R. & D. Board, is pursuing this development in top priority.

8. What is meant by the phrase "Air warning and control"? What type of "control" does this have reference to?

Control of all active defense forces employed in the air defense of the United States.

9. Is this bill intended to provide a permanent long-range system of installations or is it merely for the purpose of setting up a temporary interim system?

A permanent long-range system.

10. If the answer to question 9 is in the first alternative, why is authority sought to construct, install or equip "temporary" public works?

Certain of the facilities planned are temporary in nature.

11. Set forth verbatim the language of the three statutory sections mentioned in section 1 of the proposed Air Force bill and explain in detail precisely why it is desired to avoid the effect of these provisions.

R. S. 1136

"Permanent barracks or quarters and buildings and structures of a permanent nature shall not be constructed unless detailed estimates shall have been previously submitted to Congress, and approved by a special appropriation for the same, except when constructed by the troops; and no such structures the cost of which shall exceed $100,000, shall be erected unless by special authority of Congress. It shall be the duty of all officers of the United States having any of the title papers (properly purchased, or about to be purchased, for erection of public buildings) in their possession, to furnish them forthwith to the Attorney General. No public money shall be expended until the written opinion of the Attorney General shall be had. (R. S. 1136, 10 U. S. C. 1339, as amended by Public Law 626, 80th Cong., sec. 4 of the act of June 12, 1948)."

Comment.—This provision of law prohibits construction of any permanent public works unless detailed estimates have been submitted to Congress and approved by a specific appropriation and prohibits all construction by this Department exceeding $100,000 in value unless there has been a specific authorization for each such project. It would be necessary to obtain specific authorization for each project under this act. It would also be highly desirable to waive this Revised Statute inasmuch as most of these installations would be of restricted character and it would not be advisable to set forth the location and cost in the interest of security.

R. S. 3648

"No advance of public money shall be made in any case unless authorized by the appropriation concerned or other law. And in all cases of contracts for the performance of any service, or the delivery of articles of any description, for the use of the United States, payment shall not exceed the value of the service rendered, or of the articles delivered previously to such payment. It shall, however, be lawful, under the special direction of the President, to make such advances to the disbursing officers of the Government as may be necessary to the faithful and prompt discharge of their respective duties, and to the fulfillment of the public engagements. The President may also direct such advances as he may deem necessary and proper, to persons in the military and naval service employed on distant stations, where the discharge of the pay and emoluments to which they may be entitled cannot be regularly effected." (R. S. 3648, 31 U. S. C. 529).

Comment.—This provision of law provides that no payments for services shall be made until after such service shall have been rendered unless specifically permitted by the appropriation concerned. Waiver of this Revised Statute would permit advances of funds to contractors to acquire materials, equipment, to recruit and pay employees, etc. This is particularly important to secure the services of local contractors at isolated locations and small communities.

R. S. 3734:

No money shall be paid nor contracts made for payment for any site for a public building in excess of the amount specifically appropriated therefor. No money shall be expended upon any public building until after sketch plans showing the tentative design and arrangement of such building, together with outline description and detailed estimates of the cost thereof shall have been made by the Public Buildings Administration (except when otherwise authorized by law) and said sketch plans and estimates shall have been approved by the Federal Works administrator and the head of each * * *"
(R. S. 3734, 40 U. S. C. 259, 267).

Comment.—This law provides that no payment for sites shall be made in excess of the specific appropriation therefor. It provides that sketch plans must have received prior approval prior to expenditure of any funds for construction of public buildings. This is waived in the interests of time and to provide for the possibility of increased costs beyond the limit of the specific appropriation, otherwise the estimates would have to include provision for this contingency, or, it might be necessary to request deficiency appropriations.

12. (a) Is it contemplated that the secretary shall have authority to acquire lands or other interests in real property, without reference to the Congress at the time of such acquisition, once the present bill has become law?

Yes; subject to the provision of H. R. 2010 if enacted into law.

12. (b) Is it the view of the Air Force that acquisitions of land or rights or interests therein under the authority of this bill will or will not be subject to the provisions of H. R. 2010 now pending before the Congress, in the event that the latter bill becomes law?

Subject to the provision of H. R. 2010, with the expectation that administration procedures would be worked out to permit the chairman (or other executive agency) of the committees to act for the committees in emergency when Congress was not in session.

13. Why does the bill authorize the Secretary to acquire "The temporary use" of lands, et cetera, if it seeks to establish a permanent air-defense system?

In order to avoid paying for all land before construction and other allied activities can begin.

*14. Similarly, why does the bill authorize the Secretary "to place * * * temporary improvements thereon whether such lands are held in fee or under lease, or under other temporary tenure * * "?

The wording is "to place permanent or temporary". Some of the facilities may be "temporary" in nature, rather than "permanent".

15. Set forth verbatim the text of the two statutory sections cited in section 2 of the proposed Air Force bill, and explain the application thereof to the authority sought herein.

Not applicable to present bill.

16. Does the language of this section envisage that moneys will be appropriated generally for the purposes of this act, without reference to the specific installations or facilities upon which they are to be expended?

Yes.

17. The bill contains the following language: "Moneys so appropriated shall remain available for obligation until expended."

(a) Will there by no limit upon the length of time such moneys may remain available?

The wording "when so specified in an appropriation act," is included in the bill under consideration. It is assumed that time limits, if any, will be established by the appropriation.

(b) Will there be any restriction or limitation as to the particular projects or types of projects upon which these moneys may ultimately be expended, that is, other than the general limitation that the expenditure be within the broad framework of "the purposes of this act"?

Restrictions, if any, will be as specified in the appropriation, and as imposed by the provisions of H. R. 2010 if enacted into law. In addition, the executive procedure for release of moneys by the Bureau of the Budget would be applicable.

*18. In view of the language of section 1 which authorizes "the Secretary * * * to establish or develop * * * installations and facilities, by the construction, et cetera, of public works * * * ", why is it necessary to provide in section 3 that appropriations may be used "for expenses incident to construction, etc.?"*

This has been eliminated from the bill under consideration.

20. (a) Will the program contemplated under this bill provide a complete air warning and control system fully equipped with the necessary installations and equipment to enable it to perform with reasonable adequacy the missions of air warning and interception in the event of war?

The program contemplated would provide an aircraft warning and control system in being, consistent in adequacy with other elements of the armed forces.

(b) To what degree is it anticipated that expansion in the scope and cost of the system will be necessary in war time?

The system would, like all other military activities, and in balance therewith, be expanded considerably in war. The degree of this expansion would depend upon the nature of the war, the time it occurred and many similar factors.

21. (a) Is the present program firm?

Yes.

(b) Is the scope of this program identical in terms of cost, number of installations and other key factors to that of the program proposed a year ago?

No.

(c) For how many months has the present program been firm?

Has been approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff since October 20, 1948.

22. (a) Have there been changes in the cost estimates since this program was initially conceived?

(b) If so, give the original estimates and the new estimates at each succesive stage of revision, and give break-downs in each case.

(c) What are the reasons for such revisions as have been made to date in the character or scope of the program?

Changes have been made in the cost estimates since the current program was initiated; however, the over-all cost of the program has not altered from the original figure.

Rising construction costs have required that the programing for acquisition of real estate be changed from the initial concept of outright purchase to a plan of leasing land with option to buy.

Outright purchase of land was originally figured at $2,400,000.

Current leasing cost of all lands amounts to $288,000 per year.

Digitized by Google

The difference between these figures is an indication of the rise in construction cost estimates for the program involving $85,500,000.

24. Is there any substantial value in mere aircraft warning in and of itself alone, that is, unless it is put to advantage in directing interceptor fighters to the approaching enemy aircraft?

There is substantial value to aircraft warning in and of itself, aside from the direction of interceptors. It permits the alerting of other defense forces, both military and civilian, and allows the execution of other measures oriented on the enemy air attack. It is considered of particular and peculiar value to civil defense activities.

25. Can an aircraft warning and control system frustrate completely any and every possible enemy attack?

No. An aircraft control and warning system in itself possesses no capability to frustrate any possible enemy attack. Its value lies in the greatly increased capability it gives military and civil defense measures oriented on the enemy air attack.

26. Can an aircraft warning system prevent a sudden surprise attack if our own interceptor planes are not warmed up, manned and on the line, ready to take off at an instant's notice, 24 hours a day, every day?

No. An aircraft warning system is designed to obviate the necessity for readiness "to take off at an instant's notice, 24 hours a day, every day." It should provide an appreciable time interval for effective military and civil measures to be taken.

29. (a) Will antiaircraft artillery play any part in the defense system envisaged in this legislation?

Yes. Antiaircraft artillery will be an integral part of the air-defense system envisaged for the continental United States, and this legislation permits the installation of an aircraft warning system which enhances antiaircraft artillery capabilities.

(b) Will the full utilization of the capabilities of this system require the augmentation of existing antiaircraft defenses?

Requirements for antiaircraft artillery for employment in the air-defense system is determined in conjunction with the determination of requirements for fighter forces; this aircraft control and warning system is designed to permit full exploitation of the capabilities of both forces.

30. (a) Will the system to be authorized by this bill be of any avail whatsoever to protect the United States against enemy long-range strategic bombers?

The system to be authorized is designed to provide a defense against enemy long-range strategic bombers; total protection with known weapons is an impossibility.

(b) Is it possible to stop the enemy's strategic bombers in a sustained air offensive?

It is possible to stop some, but not all, of the enemy's strategic bombers in a sustained air offensive.

30. (c) Even assuming that some of them can be intercepted, it is not virtually a certainty that most of the strategic bombers in any given mission will reach their targets?

It is not a certainty that most of a likely enemy's strategic bombers in any given mission will reach their targets in the United States; the military and civil measures made possible by an aircraft control and warning system with defense forces adequate to the situation will increase greatly the cost to the enemy to achieve a desired result.

36. (a) How far out would it be possible to extend these early warning "Frontiers"?

It is possible to extend these frontiers to great distances but depends on access to the necessary land or sea areas involved. The practical distance to which these frontiers should be extended depends upon the expenditure of effort involved, balanced against the value, to the defended area, of the information furnished.

(b) Would it be possible to employ them as pickets to give advance warning of enemy aircraft, somewhat in the manner that Japan used fishing vessels off our coast to furnish intelligence regarding movements of our forces?

It might be possible but is not considered feasible.

37. Is there any danger that fixed land-based installations may soon become obsolete because of improvements in radar equipment, change of suitability of location because of increased air speeds, or because of other changes in technology on tactics?

The planned aircraft control and warning system will "not soon become obsolete;" the selection of sites is being made to permit their effective utilization for a long time in the future, though perhaps with different types of equipment. The system is oriented on the vital industrial and war-making potentiality of the Nation, the location of our major cities, concentrations of skilled personnel, and other vital targets changes very slowly if at all.

41. (a) How does the feasibility of using mobile land-based radar equipment compare with that of establishing fixed installations?

Poorly. It is not considered practical to use mobile land-based radar equipment in the permanent air defense of the United States, except in the gap-filling capacity.

(b) Would the former provide a desirable element of flexibility that may be lacking in the fixed installations?

The mobility would not contribute to the effectiveness of the air defense system as the installations are oriented on populated centers and important industrial areas which are considered potential target areas. A mobile element is provided by the Air National Guard, aircraft control and warning troops. Additional mobile stations will be provided to reinforce the permanent stations in the event of war.

42. (a) Is there any similarity between the functions performed by a land-based air warning and control system in directing fighters against enemy planes and those performed by the fighter director group aboard an aircraft carrier?

The objective of the aircraft control and warning system and the fighter director group aboard an aircraft carrier is identical as to the execution of interception of enemy planes by fighter aircraft—both seek the destruction of the enemy. The contrast in the requirements to be met by the two systems lies in the concentrated target afforded by a naval task force compared with the multiplicity and widespread character of vital targets in the continental United States.

(b) Is not the object in both cases the same, i. e., the fighters onto the enemy?

Yes.

44. (a) Will the air force of other armed services be able to provide enough technical personnel, including radar operators and technicians, communications experts, et cetera, to assure effective operation in peacetime of the proposed system?

All services are having difficulty in obtaining and holding necessary qualified personnel. Training programs have been expanded, however, and it is not believed that the personnel problems involved in the aircraft control and warning program envisaged by this legislation, are insufferable.

(b) What is the estimated number of personnel which will be required to permit full and effective operation of the system? Give break-downs between military and civilian and specialties required.

The aggregate strength of USAF personnel required is 9,399 augmented by 13,200 Air National Guard troops in event of a national emergency. The number of civilian technicians is 150.

(c) Would it be necessary to substantially increase this number in the event of war?

In the event that it becomes necessary to expand the system in the event of war, the number of personnel will increase accordingly.

45. (a) Will the system to be provided under this bill fully utilize the existing and potential capabilities of all equipment being developed by the Army and Navy, as well as by the Air Force, for detection, early warning, and interception of approaching enemy aircraft?

Yes; at such time as their integration into the system is justified.

(b) Does it fully utilize available methods and equipment, other than shore-based, for the detection and early warning of approaching enemy aircraft? In other words, does it utilize the capabilities of ship-borne detection equipment to the maximum extent possible?

It contemplates the utilization of air-borne and ship-borne detection equipment when and where justified.

46. Has any consideration been given to the initial establishment of a token syste which would permit careful evaluation in actual practice of the techniques upon whic this system is based, prior to committing the Nation to the expense of the over-a program?

Careful consideration has been given to the initial establishment of a toke system for evaluation purposes, and much necessary evaluation has already bee made. The present proposed program, if delayed for further testing by toke systems might always be implemented "next year," because research and develo ment is a continuing and advancing science, with something better always for seen in the future. It is considered that further delay in the installation of a operational aircraft control and warning system entails unwarranted risk Tests of limited scale will not add to our present knowledge.

47. (a) How much money is included in the budget for (a) aircraft early warni and (b) control and interception, and (c) air defense generally, for:

(i) Army?
(ii) Navy?
(iii) Air Force?

(b) Give break-downs in above figures.

As indicated in the reply to question 19, the funds included in the 1950 budg estimate for (a) aircraft early warning and (b) control and interception equipme is $26,628,000. The Navy radar picket vessels will cost approximately $7,000,0 for conversion.

(c) Do these figures include the costs of manning and maintaining antiairc defenses, housing at remote stations, maintenance of fighter aircraft, and all ot operational and housekeeping costs?

The answer to the general question as to funds will require a lenghty study the over-all budget for the National Military Establishment since the direct a indirect costs of air defense extend throughout the entire budget structure of t services.

49. (a) What will be the ultimate total annual cost of running the air warning a and control system? How will this be divided between the services?

The maintenance cost of the control and warning system as indicated in answ to question 23 is $11,450,000. This program is supported by Air Force fun

49. (b) Does this figure include all related housekeeping costs and also the cost support furnished by each service?

No.

(c) Does it include the cost of maintaining troops for the local defense of th warning installations in remote and unprotected areas, so as to insure that they a not be captured or neutralized by enemy action prior to the launching of an air att on the United States?

Interior guard only.

50. Why is it not proposed to acquire permanently in fee simple, at this time, of the lands required for this system?

If installations are contemplated outside the United States, provisions must made in event sites for installations cannot be acquired in fee.

51. List all the differences between H. R. 314 and the proposed new bill. W led to the drafting of the new bill and why was it necessary to change the provisi embodied in H. R. 314?

The proposed bill authorizes the Secretary of the Air Force to place permane improvements upon lands held under lease or under temporary tenure. H. 314 does not contain this authorization.

H. R. 314 authorizes the Secretary of the Air Force to acquire lands and righ pertaining thereto without regard to sections 355, 1136, 3648, and 3734, Revis Statutes, as amended. This authorization is not contained in the proposed b year in which appropriated and the four fiscal years thereafter. It further provides that the Secretary may expend unobligated balances of appropriations currently available to the Department, and further provides that any work undertaken under this authorization may be prosecuted by direct appropriations, or by both direct appropriations and continuing contracts, subject to the availability of subsequent appropriations. The proposed bill contains simply the following appropriation language:

"There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and when so specified in an appropriation act, such amounts shall remain available until expended."

The new bill, as presently written, reflects the latest thinking of the National Military Establishment and the Bureau of the Budget. The provision authorizing the building of permanent structures on leased land is believed essential for two reasons: First, it will permit the acquisition and use of land which might not be available for purchase, and second, it will lower the initial cost of the system.

The Bureau of the Budget suggested that the appropriation section be changed to merely authorize the appropriation of such sums of money as are necessary to carry out the purposes of the Act, and that when so specified in the appropriation act, such money should remain available until expended. The Bureau of the Budget further felt that the authority to acquire lands and erect structures thereon prior to obtaining the approval of title by the Attorney General was not essential to this program.

Mr. BROWN (reading): A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations for the national security, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby authorized to establish and develop within and without the continental limits of the United States in fulfilling the air defense responsibilities of the Department of the Air Force such land-based air warning and control installations and facilities, by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, utilities, and access roads, and to provide for necessary administration and planning therefore, without regard to sections 1136, 3648, 3734, Revised Statutes, as he may seem necessary in the interest of national security.

Mr. DURHAM. What are those statutes; 1136, 3648, and 3734?

Mr. BROWN. I have those right here, Mr. Durham. I think I might provide each member with a copy. I think it is on page 3, sir. Those are given right there. The text of each of those statutes is set forth at the bottom of page 3, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. 1136 is a restriction on the building of barracks: is that right?

Mr. BROWN. Well, sir, that is a restriction on building any structures the cost of which would exceed $100,000, except by special authority of Congress. In other words, that statute would require that before you could build any permanent barracks or quarters or permanent buildings of any type, you would have to come in and get specific authority. By excluding that provision from the operation of this act, the Department would have the authority to go ahead with the program without having to come back each time. Is that correct?

General SAVILLE. That is correct. In addition, I think there is a security provision there. In other words, if we have to get authority specifically each time, it would have to be stated that so many dollars would be for such and such an installation. We are trying every way we can to avoid that.

Mr. DURHAM. What is 3648?

Mr. BROWN. That provides that you cannot make any advance of public money unless the appropriation specifically authorizes it. You cannot make any advance payments under that statute. You have to wait until the goods are actually delivered and the services performed before you can advance any money.

The Air Force states here at the bottom of page 4 the reasons for that. They want to be in a position to make advances of funds to contractors to acquire materials, equipment, to recruit and pay employees, et cetera. They point out that it is particularly important in the case of local contractors at isolated locations.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you think this is absolutely necessary, General?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. To have this authority?

General SAVILLE. I am not an expert on this, sir, but I am informed by experts that it would be a great inconvenience and would cause a lot of difficulty and increase the cost of this if this provision were not in here.

Mr. DURHAM. What is 3734?

Mr. BROWN. That is that no money shall be paid nor contracts made for payment for any site for a public building in excess of the amount specifically appropriated therefor. No money shall be expended upon any public building until after sketch plans showing the tentative design and arrangement of such building, together with outline description and detailed estimates of the cost thereof shall have been made by the Public Buildings Administration. Such sketch plans and estimates shall have been approved by the Federal Works Administrator, and so forth.

The waiver of this is sought in the interest of time and to provide for the possibility of increased costs beyond the limit of specific appropriations. Otherwise, estimates would have to include provision for this contingency, or it might be necessary to request deficiency appropriations.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you think you need this authority, General?

General SAVILLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. All right. If there are no amendments to that section, read section 2.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 2. In furtherance of the above, the Secretary of the Air Force is authorized to make surveys and to acquire lands and rights pertaining thereto or other interests therein, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, and to place permanent and temporary improvements thereon whether such lands are held in fee or under lease, or under other temporary tenure.

Mr. DURHAM. If there are no amendments to this section, read section 3.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and when so specified in an appropriation act such amounts shall remain available until expended.

Mr. DURHAM. Are there any amendments to this section?

Off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. DOYLE. I move that the bill be amended to contain the language indicated.

Mr. DURHAM. That will go in as section 4, is that right?

Digitized by Google

General SAVILLE. That is my understanding, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Is that correct, Mr. Brown?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; that is correct, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. If there is no objection to this provision, it will be inserted as section 4.

Mr. BROWN. Do you want me to read it, sir?

Mr. DURHAM. Read the section.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall be subject to the duties and authority of the Secretary of Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment as provided in the National Security Act of 1947, Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress.

Mr. DURHAM. Is there any objection to this provision?

(No response.)

Mr. DURHAM. If there is no objection to the bill, we shall report it favorably.

(No response.)

Mr. DURHAM. The committee is adjourned.

SUBCOMMITTEE HEARING ON H. R. 1748 AND S. 630, TO AMEND SECTION 19 OF THE ACT OF AUGUST 13, 1946 (60 STAT. 1057), SO AS TO REMOVE THE UPPER-AGE LIMIT FOR APPOINTMENT TO COMMISSIONED GRADE IN THE SUPPLY CORPS OF THE NAVY

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE No. 3,
Monday, February 14, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10:00 a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham subcommittee chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee will come to order.

We have before us the bill H. R. 1748, which was introduced by me at the suggestion of the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. (H. R. 1748 is as follows:)

[H. R. 1748, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To amend section 19 of the Act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), so as to remove the upper-age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 19 of the Act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), as amended, is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. No person shall be appointed to a commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy who will be less than twenty-one years of age on July 1 of the calendar year in which appointed and until his physical, mental, and moral qualifications have been established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. DURHAM. We also have the bill S. 630, the companion bill. (S. 630 is as follows:)

[S. 630, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

AN ACT To amend section 19 of the Act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), so as to remove the upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 19 of the Act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), as amended, is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. No person shall be appointed to a commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy who will be less than twenty-one years of age on July 1 of the calendar year in which appointed and until his physical, mental, and moral qualifications have been established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy."

Passed the Senate February 8, 1949.

Mr. DURHAM. Who is here to testify?

Captain MCDILL. Captain McDill of the Judge Advocate General's Office of the Department of the Navy.

Mr. DURHAM. Captain, you may proceed.

STATEMENT BY CAPT. A. S. McDILL, OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, UNITED STATES NAVY

Captain McDILL. The bill is a new one. That is to say it has had no previous legislative history in past Congresses or this Congress at this time. It would seek to amend a law which requires that appointments as assistant paymaster in the Navy be made from persons not less than 21 nor more than 25 years of age.

There are some people in college now and at the Naval Academy who, because of late entrance to school by reason of the war period will be more than 25 years of age when they complete their schooling and are ready for appointment. This limitation of 25 years of age would preclude their appointment as assistant paymasters in the Navy.

We are seeking to remove that limitation. It is inconsistent with other provisions of law regarding appointments in the Supply Corps and to the Staff Corps in the Navy.

Mr. SASSCER. With reference to the 21 years of age requirement, this is not new in any way, is it?

Captain McDILL. No, sir.

Mr. SASSCER. The proposed bill just removes the 25 years of age limit?

Captain McDILL. Well, 21 years is the lower minimum and 25 years is the upper maximum at present for appointment as a paymaster in the Navy.

Mr. DURHAM. Why was the limitation of 25 years of age imposed Captain?

Captain McDILL. That was written into an old act. I have not the legislative history of the reason for that. It was at the request of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts to avoid having to appoint, as it were, qualified applicants—people over 25 years of age as assistant paymasters. They would be out of line in age with similar officers in the grade of ensign, which is the grade in which you are appointed—beginning appointment—in the Supply Corps.

We have officers more than 25 years of age who can transfer to the Supply Corps. We have officers who are in the line of the Navy in the grade of ensign with a couple of years' service whose eyes fail, but not sufficiently to preclude appointment. They can be appointed by initial appointments in the Navy in this corps. However, this corps is restricted at present to people under the age of 25.

Mr. SASSCER. Captain, do you have any appreciable number of Naval Academy graduates going into the Supply Corps in this capacity?

Captain McDILL. At present we have a graduating class in which about 25, it is estimated now, will transfer to the Supply Corps.

Mr. SASSCER. You use the word "transfer." A moment ago you said you could transfer officers from other branches.

Captain McDILL. From the line in the Navy.

Mr. SASSCER. But by using "transfer" in the sense you are now using it, you mean appointed?

Captain McDILL. Appointed and initial appointment from the Navy in the Supply Corps is regarded as initial appointment in the Navy or Staff Corps. I do not know how many of that group are over 25 years of age, but the average age of those graduated from the Naval Academy now is very close to 24.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SASSCER. It would seem it is a matter which could well be handled administratively in the Navy.

Captain McDILL. In the case of Naval Academy graduates, that is true, sir. They could be commissioned——

Mr. SASSCER. I mean if this bill is passed, the appointment of the older personnel can be handled administratively in the Navy without that restrictive provision.

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SASSCER. I suggest that the bill be reported.

Mr. DURHAM. Any further objection?

Mr. SASSCER. I move that the bill be favorably reported.

Mr. DURHAM. Without any objection, the bill will be reported favorably.

Do I hear a motion to substitute the bill S. 630 for this bill?

Mr. SASSCER. I move that S. 630 be substituted for H. R. 1748, and that it be reported favorably.

Mr. DURHAM. Without objection, it is so ordered. S. 630 is favorably reported.

SUBCOMMITTEE HEARING ON H. R. 1793 AND S. 279, TO AUTHORIZE THE ADVANCE ON THE RETIRED LIST OF LT. JOHN T. M'DERMOTT, UNITED STATES NAVY (RETIRED), TO THE GRADE OF LIEUTENANT COMMANDER

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3,
Monday, February 14, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10:30 a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham (subcommittee chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The bill before us is H. R. 1793. Captain McDill, are you prepared to testify on this bill?

(H. R. 1793 is as follows:)

[H. R. 1793, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To authorize the advance on the retired list of Lieutenant John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), to the grade of lieutenant commander

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, Lieutenant John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), shall be advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander on the retired list effective for all purposes from the date of his retirement.

STATEMENT BY CAPT. A. S. M'DILL, OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, UNITED STATES NAVY

Captain MCDILL. Yes, sir. Lt. John T. McDermott, who is the subject of this bill which is in the nature of private relief legislation, entered the naval service as a midshipman on May 31, 1916. He graduated June 7, 1919, and was commissioned in the line of the Navy and served continuously through and including the grade of lieutenant until June 30, 1941, at which time, by reason of his having failed of selection twice under the act of June 23, 1938 (the former Personnel Act), he was retired in the grade of lieutenant commander and with the pay of a lieutenant commander, by virtue of the Navy Department's interpretation of section 12 (k) of the act of June 23, 1938.

The section provided that lieutenants being retired with service in the Navy or the then Naval Reserve Forces, of more than 24 years were to be retired and with service prior to November 12, 1918, would be retired with three-quarters of the active duty pay of a lieutenant commander.

The Navy Department interpreted the service prior to November 12, 1918, at the Naval Academy as naval service. Lieutenant McDermott, fulfilling all those qualifications, was retired in the grade of lieutenant commander with three-quarters of the active duty pay of an officer of that rank and service.

Digitized by Google

The Assistant Comptroller General on January 8, 1947, held that that service at the Naval Academy prior to November 12, 1918, could not be counted and that Lieutenant McDermott was entitled to only three-quarters of the active duty pay of a lieutenant of 22 years' service. Consequently, he became indebted to the Government in the sum of $2,300.

It is true that the section under which he was retired has been repealed by a subsequent statute, the Officer Personnel Act of 1947, but the Assistant Comptroller General has ruled that that statute does not apply to him. So he is still under a checkage of $2,300, the execution of which, the Navy Department feels, would be an injustice since it was through their misunderstanding and a conflict with an interpretation by the Comptroller General.

The Navy Department seeks this remedial legislation for this single individual who is, incidentally, the only one to whom it could apply.

Mr. DURHAM. Captain, you will recall that we have had legislation before us, to my knowledge, twice before, with the objective of counting service at the Academy for retirement purposes. Thus far we have refused to enact that legislation into law. What kind of precedent would this set? How big a group would it affect? Is there any one else in the Navy in this situation?

Captain MCDILL. No, sir; there is no one else in the Navy in this situation who would have to have a checkage forgiven or who would be subject to checkage in the future. He is the only one with this length of service under those circumstances.

Mr. DURHAM. The bill we had up last year, if it had been passed, would have given credit for time at the academies. That bill would have solved this problem.

Captain MCDILL. Yes, sir. It would have, but that was broad legislation to cover everyone. I think you have reference to——

Mr. HARLOW. S. 657.

Captain MCDILL. S. 657. It passed the Senate and failed in the House and that related to counting service at the academies for purposes of pay but not for purposes of retirement, sir. I think it would have been questionable, had S. 657 been enacted by the House whether it would have forgiven the checkage of Lieutenant McDermott.

Mr. DURHAM. Would this legislation be setting a precedent in regard to future efforts to count academy time for pay and retirement?

Captain MCDILL. It would be, sir; but for the fact that there is only one person involved at this time and there is not likely to be any others.

Mr. DURHAM. You now have a large number of retired personnel who graduated from the Naval Academy and from West Point, who don't draw retirement or don't get credit for their time at the academies. These men are already retired. How would this bill affect them?

Captain MCDILL. It would not affect them, sir, since they have been retired under many other provisions of the law, principally this act of 1938 which has been repealed and the physical retirement statutes. If they did not have service prior to November 12, 1918, service at the Academy would not be counted. They could not count their 4 years—or 3 years between the period 1916 and 1919 when we had the 3-year course at the academies—in their retirement pay. Those acts were all based on active commissioned service.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. You do not think it would affect them? There would be no effect on the long list of officers already retired?

Captain McDILL. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. It would not apply to them?

Captain McDILL. No, sir.

Mr. FISHER. This situation is a very obvious injustice to this man, the way it stands at this time.

Captain McDILL. It is. There are other cases in the cases of former enlisted men who have been retired with a higher rank but not higher pay.

Mr. DOYLE. As I understand the situation, this officer received this money. He now has it. He received it properly, but through a difference in opinion between two administrative departments of the Government he is being held accountable for its repayment to the Government.

Captain McDILL. That is correct.

Mr. DOYLE. If this bill is not passed he owes the Government $2,300?

Captain McDILL. That is correct.

Mr. DOYLE. Having done nothing and through no fault of his own but having received the money under a decision of a department of the Government?

Captain McDILL. That is correct.

Mr. DURHAM. I do not want to get in the position of creation a precedent by this bill. I don't like to do that by a private bill. If this bill sets no precedent, I see no objection to the bill.

Captain McDILL. We had formerly drafted it in general terms, but since that, discovered about a year ago that it applied only to McDermott. In the Senate they recommended that it be drafted to cover McDermott alone in the nature of private relief legislation.

Mr. FISHER. Has this bill passed the Senate?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FISHER. This session?

Captain McDILL. It has passed this session; yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Any questions, Mr. Blackney?

Mr. BLACKNEY. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Doyle?

Mr. DOYLE. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Sasscer?

Mr. SASSCER. Yes; I am thoroughly in accord with the attempt to remedy what is apparently an injustice, but I would like to get cleared up on the mechanics of procedure. He is now a lieutenant?

Captain McDILL. He is; yes, sir.

Mr. SASSCER. To offset the sum of approximately $2,300 which he is now indebted to the Government, you promote him in rank so he would get higher retirement pay?

Captain McDILL. Actually he is on the retirement list as a lieutenant commander and he is drawing—his pay would be (under the Comptroller General's decision) three-quarters of a lieutenant's with 24 years' service.

Mr. SASSCER. That's what I mean. Instead of setting a precedent and giving him back this $2,300, or giving him credit for service in the Academy, you are moving him up one notch in his retirement grade so we can resolve it that way?

Digitized by Google

Captain McDILL. So we can count that time to move him into the next pay grade—that of a lieutenant commander with 24 years' service.

Mr. SASSCER. How would that compare to what the pay is now?

Captain McDILL. I think on the retirement list it is about $37 a month. Do you have that?

Mr. HARLOW. No; I do not have the pay tables here.

Captain McDILL. He does get approximately $37 more.

Mr. SASSCER. He gets $37 a month now? Did you say a year or a month?

Captain McDILL. A month, sir.

Mr. SASSCER. And after a certain number of months this amount for which he is indebted to the Government would be absorbed?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, in effect, you are giving him credit for the time he spent in the Academy. That is what you are actually doing under the bill?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SASSCER. What happens to the $2,300 in the meantime? Is payment of that stayed?

Captain McDILL. No, sir; he has not paid that yet, as I understand it. The Attorney General has forborne prosecution pending the outcome of this legislation.

Mr. SASSCER. If this legislation is passed, it does not stop the Comptroller General from collecting this $2,300?

Captain McDILL. It is designed to do that. It is designed to stop him from enforcing that decision.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Fisher, do you have any questions?

Mr. FISHER. No questions.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Havenner?

Mr. HAVENNER. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Do I hear a motion to report this bill?

Mr. BLACKNEY. I move the adoption of the bill.

Mr. DURHAM. If there is no objection, it is so ordered. That is H. R. 1793. Now, is there a motion to substitute S. 279 for this bill?

Mr. BLACKNEY. I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. You have heard the motion. If there is no objection S. 279 is favorably reported.

Have we any other business?

Mr. HARLOW. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee stands adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 10:45 a. m., the subcommittee adjourned.)

SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS ON H. R. 1741, TO AUTHORIZE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A JOINT LONG-RANGE PROVING GROUND FOR GUIDED MISSILES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE No. 1,
Monday, February 14, 1949.

The subcommittee met, at 10 a. m., Hon. Overton Brooks (chairman), presiding.

Mr. BROOKS. The subcommittee will please come to order.

Gentlemen, we have today for consideration H. R. 1741, a bill to authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes.

(H. R. 1741 and the reports accompanying are as follows:)

[H. R. 1741, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby authorized to establish a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and other weapons by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and utilities, within or without the continental limits of the United States, for scientific study, testing, and training purposes by the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Air Force is authorized in discharging the authority given in the preceding section to make surveys, to acquire lands and rights or other interests pertaining thereto, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, without regard to section 3648, Revised Statutes, as amended, in administering the provisions of the Act of July 9, 1942 (56 Stat. 654, 43 U. S. C., Supp. 315q).

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $200,000,000 to carry out the purposes of sections 1 and 2 of this Act.

SEC. 4. The Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force are hereby authorized to contribute to the support of the joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and other weapons to the extent they may deem necessary or advisable, including, but not limited to, the allocation for such support of funds available to them for such purposes.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Defense may, at his discretion, transfer and reallocate to any department, board or agency within the National Military Establishment all, or any part of the authority granted herein, and, in connection with such transfer or reallocation, may transfer all or any part of the funds available for the establishment or support of the joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and other weapons.

[No. 4]

TO AUTHORIZE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A JOINT LONG-RANGE PROVING GROUND FOR GUIDED MISSILES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 1741). MR. BROOKS

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, Jan. 14, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Secretary of the Air Force recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Air Force.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, January 7, 1949.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes, which the Department of the Air Force recommends be enacted into law. The Secretary of Defense has assigned responsibility for the preparation and submission of this measure on, behalf of the National Military Establishment, to this Department. This proposed measure is similar to S. 2761, introduced in the second session of the Eightieth Congress.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to provide substantive law authorizing the Secretary of the Air Force to acquire, construct, and equip a joint long-range proving ground. This proving ground is required primarily for the development and testing of guided missiles of ranges greater than 150 miles, and for subsequent training of personnel. The proposed bill, upon enactment, will serve as a basis for requesting appropriations for the establishment of such joint long-range proving ground and for such additional bases and ranges as may be later determined to be necessary.

The field of guided missiles is still within its infancy. Certain other nations have availed themselves of the services of German scientists and technicians and are making vigorous efforts to produce guided missiles of intercontinental ranges. It will not suffice for the United States to merely keep abreast of or equal the efforts of other nations; but, in order that this Nation may survive, it will be necessary for the United States to take the lead in this new field. Accordingly, there is an immediate and urgent necessity for acquiring, constructing, and equipping a land-based proving ground where guided missiles, now under development and scheduled for tests in the near future, can be flight tested at long ranges.

The entire question of a guided-missile proving ground where missiles with ranges in excess of 150 miles could be tested was referred by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Joint Research and Development Board upon the establishment of that Board in July 1946. A committee, in which all three services had equal representation, was formed on October 7, 1946, with the specific objective of "examining the entire question of a single, national, long-range guided-missile proving ground." This committee submitted a report to the Joint Research and Development Board on June 20, 1947, recommending the immediate establishment of a joint long-range proving ground and, as a result of the recommendation, the Board, in letters addressed to the Secretaries of War and Navy, approved the establishment of a long-range proving ground for guided missiles and allocated the responsibility for acquiring, building, and equipping the range to the War Department.

Since the enactment of the National Security Act of 1947 the responsibility has been reassigned to the Department of the Air Force. A joint executive group, embodying equal participation by the Army, Navy, and Air Force, has been established to pursue the project.

In order to meet the requirements of the guided-missile programs of the three armed services, it is essential that this range be in operation at the earliest possible

ite. The Department of the Army and the Department of the Navy join with e Department of the Air Force in urgently recommending the enactment of is legislation.

This proposed bill has been coordinated among the departments and boards the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed the Secretary of Defense.

The fiscal effect of the proposed legislation is manifest in that there is authorized e expenditure of not more than $200,000,000 to carry out the purposes of this t.

The Bureau of the Budget has been consulted and advises that there is no jection to the submission of the proposed legislation for the consideration of e Congress.

Sincerely,

W. STUART SYMINGTON.

Mr. BROOKS. We have several witnesses here. I don't have a list—o you, Mr. Brown—of the order in which the witnesses would like o appear.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, General Fairchild is the first witness.

Mr. BROOKS. General Fairchild, will you take the stand, please, r, as the first witness in this hearing.

General FAIRCHILD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. You have a prepared statement, I believe?

General FAIRCHILD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. All right, then, if you will proceed with your prepared tatement, General.

I would suggest this to the members of the committee, if it is hat you would like to do, that we have these prepared statements isposed of by letting the witnesses read them and then we will serve the questioning until the end of the prepared statements. erhaps we will have to go into executive session for the questioning.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that is a splendid suggestion Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROOKS. General, if you will proceed with your prepared tatement, the committee will make notes and reserve their questions ntil later on.

TATEMENT BY GEN. MUIR S. FAIRCHILD, VICE CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

General FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the com-ittee, the Air Force much appreciates this opportunity to appear efore your committee, jointly with the other agencies of the National ilitary Establishment, in support of this project which is considered great importance by the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the epartments of the Army, Navy and Air Force. The legislation efore you is enabling legislation for a joint long-range proving ground r guided missiles. We believe such a range to be an absolute quirement, in order to develop weapons that are essential to the ational security.

It should be borne in mind through this discussion, and those to llow, that this long-range proving ground is a joint venture of the rmy, Navy, and Air Force. As will be brought out in more detail ter, all services have need for such a facility in varying degree, and om its inception, each service has had equal representation in all ases of the planning. In proposing the project to the Secretary Defense, the Research and Development Board recommended that onsorship of the project be assigned to the Air Force. The Secretary Defense approved the proposal, including that recommendation.

Digitized by Google

Although the Air Force will have over-all responsibility for the range, each service, and the civilian scientists, will be appropriately represented thereat. Attention is invited to the provisions of section 5 of the proposed legislation, which enables the Secretary of Defense to change the primary responsibility to either of the other services should he, for any reason, feel that such a change would better serve the National Military Establishment.

The most qualified personnel of each service have in the past been made available for the preliminary work on this project, and the Secretaries of the Army and Navy have assured the Secretary of the Air Force that this policy will continue. They, in turn, have been assured that their needs will be considered on a par with those of the Air Force, and rigid adherence to this policy has been directed. I can truly say that the joint long-range proving ground, although started before passage of the National Security Act of 1947, is a perfect example of cooperative effort on the part of the three services, in a project that is urgently needed by each, to the end that a proper facility will be obtained with a minimum expenditure of funds.

In discussing this project, it would be desirable if we were able to predict exactly the relative importance of guided missiles in any possible future conflict. Unfortunately, we cannot, at this time, make such exact predictions as to the role which guided missiles will play in future. The potentialities of these new weapons, however, were clearly indicated in the latter stages of World War II when the Germans employed, with considerable effect, the V–1 and V–2 surface-to-surface missiles and we ourselves employed radio-controlled bombs. Our experts who are working in this field feel it quite likely that within 10 years we will be replacing present guns and bombs by guided missiles and that within 15 years surface-to-surface guided missiles will have been perfected to the extent that they will have important applications in the field of tactical and strategic bombardment operations. Of course these potentialities cannot ultimately be realized unless we energetically pursue, research and development, operational experimentation, and training.

Since the end of the war, we have comoleted a number of research studies on all types of missiles, and we are now entering the development stage on selected projects which we believe will produce high performance guided missiles in all categories: surface-to-surface, surface-to-air, air-to-surface, and air-to-air missiles. An essential element of this program, however, is an adequate flight test facility—the long-range proving ground.

To summarize, the Army, Navy and Air Force recognize the importance of guided missiles in wars of the future. We have deliberately elected to produce weapons in this field far superior to any used in World War II, involving considerable basic research, rather than to conduct a "crash" program, which would produce a usable weapon of limited effectiveness and at excessive cost. Our program has proceeded to a point where a flight test range of far greater length than any now in existence is an absolute necessity. Missiles with ranges up to 500 miles will be ready for testing during 1949, without a range of sufficient length on which to fly them. If the services are unable to test these and other long-range missiles at time of completion, the entire schedule of research and development will be disrupted. As a result, it is possible that other nations may be able to forge ahead is country in the development of long-range guided missiles. It is r these reasons I urge that you favorably consider the legislation w before you authorizing the construction of a joint long-range oving ground.

General Sayler of the Army will, with your permission, follow me ith some remarks in support of this project.

Admiral Gallery of the Navy has prepared a statement which he d planned to give. Unfortunately, due to the shortness of notice this hearing he was unable to cancel a commitment for a Research d Development Board meeting. He therefore has sent Commander arris to present the statement he had intended to give.

Dr. Compton, of the Research and Development Board, is prepared make a statement concerning the work of the Board in this field.

General Richardson, of the Air Staff, who has supervised the plan- ng for the joint long-range proving ground, will conclude with some tails concerning it.

All of these statements have received clearance from the Bureau of e Budget.

If at the conclusion of these remarks there is anything further that u wish to know about the project, we will all be available for estioning.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, General.

We will now call on Maj. Gen. H. B. Sayler, of the United States rmy.

General, will you step forward, please, sir.

ATEMENT BY MAJ. GEN. H. B. SAYLER, UNITED STATES ARMY

General SAYLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, General Fairchild s forcefully explained the necessity and importance of the proposed int long-range proving ground for guided missiles.

The Army is in complete accord with the philosophy of a joint opera- on for this important project. It is believed that by this joint opera- on maximum efficiency will be obtained, that all the services will joy significant advantages as a result of intimate association with l projects conducted at such a station, and that this method of eration will be most economical.

From the time of the original decision that such an installation was quired as an element of the National Military Establishment, the rmy has actively supported the project. The most experienced rsonnel, both military and civilian, have been assigned to this task required, and it is intended to continue this policy.

The Army program of research and development in the guided- issile field includes a number of items which can be flight-tested only hen the joint long-range proving ground becomes available. Such sting must be accomplished to determine the effectiveness and sound- ss of the research program.

The Army firmly believes that this joint long-range proving ground ill provide the only sound economic solution to the problem of test ing long-range guided missiles for all the services, and to that end holeheartedly supports the project.

Thank you.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that it is your wish have all of these prepared statements read before any questions are sked of any of the witnesses?

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROOKS. That is the thought there. And we will ask the wi nesses if possible to remain here so we can question them all in exec tive session. I am told a good deal of this involves top military secret

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, there is a good bit of that is a matter of public interest and information and is not of a mil tary nature. I appreciate that there will be confidential materia but if a question of that nature arises, it can be deferred until we do g into executive session. It seems to me there are other areas of prop public inquiry which shouldn't be closed to the public.

Mr. BROOKS. Anything that is a matter of proper public inquir which is not confidential, certainly ought not be in executive sessio

I think the orderly procedure would be to hear all of these prepare statements.

If the gentleman has some subject in mind in connection with th which is not confidential, of course the committee would want t hear that in open session, but if it goes into the realm of militar secrets I know the gentleman wouldn't want that in open session.

Mr. RIVERS. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that they are goir to give us other information in executive session, in addition to th that they have presented?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes; a great deal of additional information.

Mr. RIVERS. I see.

Mr. BROOKS. Rear Adm. D. V. Gallery is not here, being u avoidably absent, but Commander Harris I believe is here.

Commander HARRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Commander, will you come forward and give Admir Gallery's statement. I understand that the Admiral will be availab for questioning at a later date?

Commander HARRIS. Yes; he will be available tomorrow, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF REAR ADM. D. V. GALLERY, UNITED STATE NAVY, BY COMMANDER DAVID A. HARRIS

Commander HARRIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the com mittee, the Navy concurs in, supports, and recommends early enact ment of the proposed legislation for the establishment of the join long-range proving ground for guided missiles.

As will be noted in the title of the proposed bill, the word "joint emphasizes the mutual use and joint nature of this single facilit whereat the needs of all three services may be met. This is a majo project in which complete unity and accord has been demonstrate since its inception.

The Navy has a definite need for this facility. The guided-missil program of the Navy requires the use of a proving ground of sufficien extent to provide the necessary testing, proving, and eventual train ing of personnel in the operational use of long- and medium-rang missiles.

Having long realized this future requirement, the Navy has sup ported this project since its inception both with material and person nel. During the early study stages, the Navy provided personnel, transport, and services. Since the task of supplementing the directive of the Secretary of Defense relative to the joint long-range proving ground project was assigned to the Air Force, the Navy has coninued to support the project and assist the Air Force in accomplishng this mission. Personnel have been assigned to duty with the Air Force, and the Bureau of Yards and Docks, of the Navy, is presently ngaged in making engineering studies and designs leading to the onstruction of all offshore facilities.

While the Navy does not expect to make as extensive use of this ange as some of the other services, yet the Navy does have a very lefinite need for this facility and desires to go on record as supporting his project as one which is essential to the development of guided nissiles by this country and vital to our national security.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Commander.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, there are some questions I would like o ask of the Navy. If you want to wait and bring these witnesses ack in their turn, I will wait until then.

Mr. BROOKS. If it is all right with you, Mr. Cole, I think, since we ave started out by letting them deliver their prepared statements, it ould be more in order to go ahead.

Mr. COLE. All right.

Mr. BROOKS. If you have any reason for making a change——

Mr. COLE. No.

Mr. BROOKS. All right.

We have here Dr. Karl T. Compton, Chairman of the Research and Development Board and President of MIT. Doctor, would you step orward, sir. We are delighted to have you here again before the ommittee.

Dr. COMPTON. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Have a seat, sir, and proceed.

STATEMENT BY DR. KARL T. COMPTON, CHAIRMAN, RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT BOARD

Dr. COMPTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, since the research, development, and test of guided missiles is a comparatively new field, I will start my discussion by explaining a few of the terms that are in daily usage in this work. First, what is a guided missile? The currently accepted definition is that it is "an unmanned vehicle moving above the earth's surface, whose trajectory or flight path is capable of being altered by a mechanism within the vehicle."

By mutual consent, the services have further subdivided guided missiles into four categories according to the manner of launching and the location of target. These are: Surface-to-surface, surface-to-air, air-to-air, and air-to-surface. A surface-to-surface guided missile, for example, is one which is launched from the ground or from a ship and is thence steered during its flight to strike its distant target, which may be an enemy ship or factory or other military objective on the ground or sea. An air-to-surface missile would be one launched from an airplane against a target on the surface of the earth, either on land or sea, and moving or stationary. Note particularly that we do not include ordinary bombs, shells, or bullets, as these missiles do not incorporate an internal mechanism to influence their trajectory.

The proving ground under discussion today is required primarily for the completion of research and development work on guided missiles with ranges greater than 150 miles, for which no facility now exists in this country. There are other requirements for this facility, however, as will be brought out by General Richardson.

To further explain guided missiles as compared to conventional shells or bombs, and at the risk of oversimplification, let us consider the action of these two types of missiles. The artillery shell or bullet is fired from a gun at a high velocity. After firing, it is influenced only by atmospheric conditions and gravity. The airplane bomb, after it leaves the plane, is affected only by the motion of the plane at launching, the atmosphere, and gravity. In both cases, accuracy of the initial aim plus prediction of atmospheric conditions and possible movement of the target are the factors that determine a hit or miss.

The guided missile, on the other hand, usually has incorporated in it a motor which takes over after launching and accelerates the missile or continues it at a constant speed for an extended period of time, thereby increasing its range. Various internal mechanisms may be used to provide guidance and control to the missile while in flight. These mechanisms are controlled in various ways by outside influences, such as by raido or radar, as one example. The missile may have some kind of "seeing eye" which automatically steers it to its target after it has come within a few miles of its objective.

By these means, a missile can fly a predetermined course to a target, recognize it, and make final alterations to its course, in order to deliver the warhead within the target area. All this will be done eventually at supersonic speeds to reduce the possibility of enemy defense against it. I hasten to say that this oversimplified description of a guided missile is, in no sense, what we have today, but is what we are working toward. At the same time, however, I will state that none of the features so briefly described are considered insurmountable by American science, and all are in an encouraging state of development.

A test range is an area within which the experimental guided missiles can be tested in flight to study their over-all performance and the behavior of all their parts: wings, motors, electronic equipment, rudders, stabilizers, etc. By such tests, faults can be identified and corrected, adjustments perfected, and alternative methods of operation compared. Without the benefit of such tests, the manufactured missiles would be so unreliable that the money spent on their development would be largely wasted.

An important term that is used repeatedly in connection with test ranges is instrumentation. This term is applied to the integrated system of devices used at a range to acquire the test data. One function or element of the instrumentation system is called telemetering, which may be described as the transmission of data from the missile to the ground by electrical means. It is essential that the scientist who is developing a missile know exactly what is happening within it all at times. Telemetering data tell us how engines, control surfaces, and other mechanisms of the missile are functioning, and whether the missile is rolling, tumbling, or deviating from its course. These data are picked up at various ground instrumentation stations located at intervals along the predicted flight path.

If I might interpolate just a bit into my prepared statement, I would like to use this illustration. You all know the instrumentation panel which is in front of a pilot of an airplane, which gives the performance of the motor, his compass, and all the details that he needs to know about the functioning of the instruments. It is by means of the readings on those instruments that he properly controls his craft.

Well, now, in a guided missile, there is no pilot there who can see those things, but it is necessary to have that same kind of information. So the instruments are put in the guided missile; but, instead of having the pilot in the guided missile to look at the instruments, all the readings of/those instruments are sent down by some kind of radio control to the ground and reproduced on instruments at the ground so that the observer on the ground sees what is going on in the plane just as if he was sitting in the cockpit of a guided missile and looking at the instruments themselves. That is the telemetering device.

In addition to the telemetering receivers at each station, special electronic instruments are necessary to track the missile throughout its flight to continually indicate its position in space, as well as high-speed cameras to take pictures of the launching and early part of the flight.

At the conclusion of a flight, a study of the data thus obtained gives a complete picture of what happened to the missile during its entire flight. Even the simplest missile, made to test a particular component of the finished product, costs many thousands of dollars. The more complicated may well run into the hundreds of thousands. This reason, alone, makes it absolutely essential for both economy and success that a flight-test range have adequate instrumentation to produce the data necessary in the experimental work connected with the development of guided missiles.

You are undoubtedly interested in the question of the hazard to people and property, and the interference with private and commercial interests, in connection with the test flying of missiles on the proposed range. In the minds of the uninitiated, the danger element has been greatly exaggerated; the mere mention of guided missiles conjures up visions of death and destruction. Actually the danger in this case will be very small, because every possible precaution will be taken to make it so. The test missiles will not have explosive warheads; they will have means to dispose of them in the air, over a safe area, if they deviate too far off course. They will normally fly so high that it will be impossible to detect them without special instruments. From a safety standpoint, they will be no more dangerous than a conventional airplane flying overhead; from a nuisance standpoint, they will be less objectionable. Most important of all, the test range will be located in a region so sparsely inhabited, in the areas where there might be any danger, that the hazard will be wholly negligible.

I have tried to give you a brief picture of a guided missile from the point of view of the scientist who is developing it, some of the terms used, and the essentials of a test range. We who have been associated with the guided-missile field from its inception are convinced that weapons such as I have described, with ranges in the hundreds of miles and accuracies acceptable to the military, can be developed. To develop them, we must have a range on which to test them. The need is urgent. Actually, the guided-missile development program is one of our largest research and development programs, and hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of the results of this work are becoming dependent on the availability of such a test range. As so often happens, we will need this facility before it is in operation even if work were started on it today, as we are rapidly outgrowing existing facilities.

I do not mean by that that the existing ranges are becoming obsolete. On the contrary, I cannot visualize the time when we will not need the three existing smaller ranges. However, none of them permit expansion in length; and we are in dire need of a facility that can meet all of our foreseeable needs in the field of the long-range guided missiles.

I have purposely kept my discussion in general terms and left the presentation of detailed information to General Richardson. As already mentioned, this project has been critically studied by the experts of the Committee on Guided Missiles of the Research and Development Board, and unanimously approved by them and by the Board.

Thank you.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Doctor.

We next have Brig. Gen. William L. Richardson, of the United States Air Force.

General, will you have a seat, sir, and proceed?

STATEMENT BY BRIG. GEN. WILLIAM L. RICHARDSON, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

General RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Guided Missiles Committee of the Joint Chiefs of Staff 3 years ago recognized the necessity for a test range much longer than any existing facility, and turned the matter over to its successor, the Joint Research and Development Board. The Research and Development Board promptly established, in the fall of 1946, the Committee on Long-Range Proving Ground, of which I had the honor of being chairman. This committee, which consisted of representatives from the Army, Navy, and Air Force, was given, as a mission, the examination of the entire question of a single national long-range guided-missile proving ground.

The first question before the committee was to determine whether there was a definite requirement for such a facility. Investigation of the armed forces guided-missile development program qickly revealed an urgent requirement for this facility.

The next question was to determine the characteristics of an ideal proving ground. After detailed discussion, 17 weighted factors were established for the ideal range, which I will summarize by three basic requirements.

Mr. Chairman, we would like to refer to this board, and I believe believe if you put it up in this corner, Colonel Turner, we can best see it. This chart is a schematic diagram of what we might call an ideal proving ground.

First, a base area, with a suitable launching site, supported by adequate technical facilities, located within the continental limits of the United States.

Second, a range at least 3,000 miles long, thoroughly instrumented by means of observations stations for the first 500 miles, and with impact areas at various points along the line of flight.

Third, a climate such that year-round operating conditions will prevail.

Digitized by Google

I would like to discuss these requirements in a little more detail. The base area, in general, subdivides into three main features: the launching site—do you want to point these out, Colonel Turner?—supporting technical facilities, and administrative facilities. The launching site is comparatively simple, consisting of concrete platforms from which to launch the missiles, and an appropriate number of concrete structures to house personnel and instruments which must be present during missile launching.

After considerable study and discussion, it was decided that, for reasons of safety, the area within 5 miles of the launching site must be under military control and, in general, must be cleared of all persons except those involved in the launching. It follows that a launching site in even a moderately populated area is economically not feasible in view of the number of people in an area of that size who would have to be relocated.

I will pass briefly over the supporting technical facilities, as they present no novel problem. Test missiles will arrive at the base ready for assembling, servicing, and launching, but rather complete shops, laboratories, and static test facilities will be needed to make minor modifications, repairs and preflight tests.

In discussing the administrative facilities required, we contemplate an eventual community of 13,000 inhabitants. (5,000 military and civilian employees, 8,000 dependents), the great majority being permanent residents. This community must be established at some distance from a large city, and therefore cannot depend on such a center for housing, shopping, schools, and other necessities of American life. This makes it necessary to provide these facilities to a minimum degree, working in close cooperation with the surrounding communities, regardless of how small, to assure no duplication or undesirable competition.

Allow me to emphasize that we do not plan to construct an installation to accomodate 13,000 individuals initially. We are working under a very positive directive that minimum essential facilities only will be included in the initial installation. However, the present estimates indicate that a base area of this magnitude eventually will be required, and initial requirements should be integrated into the eventual plan to the extent that is economically feasible. This is a facility which will be used to test guided missiles, which we firmly believe will be of permanent and ever-increasing importance to the Military Establishment; and, although we are planning on a modest start, we consider it a permanent installation, which must be laid out to permit the expansion that is indicated.

The second and most difficult requirement is that of an adequate flight test range. Means of providing continuous information on the position and behavior of the missile throughout its entire flight is desirable, and is considered essential during the first 500 miles. Accurate information on the behavior of the missile at the point of impact must also be provided. To meet these requirements it is necessary to place suitable devices at intervals of 50 to 100 miles along the surface projection of the predicted line of flight of the missile. A communications network along the range is necessary to tie these devices together and provide a master time standard at each station. This network also provides command circuits to the instrumentation tations and the weather observation stations which are necessary for atmospheric data prior to each flight.

The third major requirement is suitable climatic conditions for all-year operation. Much of our work must be outdoors and this excludes extremely cold temperatures and excessive rains. Visual tracking and photography of the flight at take-off play an important role in the testing of missiles and cannot be accomplished in climates where there is a high degree of fog or poor visibility. Since electronic devices are important in down-range instrumentation, the regions of natural electronic disturbances must be avoided.

To complete our discussion of this project, I would like to emphasize that we plan initially to provide only the minimum facilities essential to flight-test long-range missiles and to expand these facilities only as work load and other conditions dictate.

You are familiar with the fact that we are now testing missiles and components at three principal ranges: White Sands-Alamogordo in New Mexico, Point Mugu and Inyokern in California. You may wonder about consolidation of these facilities with this proposed long-range proving ground. Disregarding present and anticipated work loads, the existing ranges are not capable of expansion in length to accomplish the long-range task. An independent committee of the Research and Development Board has made a survey of the work loads of existing ranges and has come to the conclusion that they will be saturated in the next few years. This committee recognized the fact that, as originally conceived, the joint long-range proving ground was for missiles with ranges over 150 miles, but stated that this was an arbitrary restriction that should not prevent flight testing of shorter range missiles if they could be worked in. The services all agree to this expansion of the original concept of the range so long as it does not interfere with the primary long-range flight-test mission.

It is the firm conviction of all authorities in this field that as longer range missile development progresses the requirement for short ranges to test missile components will increase rather than diminish. For this reason, the establishment of the range proposed here in no way eliminates or lessens the requirement for existing ranges.

So far we have discussed only the research and development aspect of this range, which is considered the primary purpose of the facility but it has an additional mission which must not be overlooked. This is operational training on guided missiles. When a new weapon such as the guided missile is finally accepted by a service, there remains the very great problem of training troops to use it and the development of tactics in connection with its use. This is an operation that will continue as long as we accept the weapon as standard and will change with each modification. We have taken this factor into consideration and, while presenting the requirement as one for research and development, have not overlooked that it will eventually be used to develop tactical doctrines and train troops.

In closing I wish to state that we feel the development of guided missiles must be pursued without delay, in the interest of national security. We confidently expect that air-to-air missiles and surface-to-air missiles will greatly enhance our ability to ward off devastating air attacks by an enemy; that air-to-surface missiles and surface-to-surface missiles will be necessary in order to launch effective and timely counterattacks. We are certain, also, that these vehicles will provide us with the means to investigate the upper air scientifically and eventually to explore outer space, and that they will have application as high-speed commercial air carriers. But we must gain and retain technical superiority over foreign countries in this field—we all know the danger of an apathetic attitude in these matters and the consequences of "too little and too late." We have the technicians and industrial potential to develop them, but currently lack a facility essential to their completion. This facility is a proving ground of sufficient length to test them, which we hope the Congress will provide by favorable action on the bill before you.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, General.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, you have heard the prepared statements. I think that is all. Is there any other statement, Mr. Brown?

Mr. BROWN. That is all.

Mr. BROOKS. Those are the prepared statements.

Is there any testimony now which the committee wishes to develop which would not be considered in executive session?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of questions I would like to ask of Dr. Compton, representing the Research and Development Board.

Mr. BROOKS. Doctor, would you mind stepping forward, again, sir? And may I say this to all of the witnesses, too. Of course, because of the nature of the subject, there is naturally a good deal of top military secret material in this matter. So may I suggest to all of the witnesses if any question asked elicits an answer which would be a military secret that the witness so indicate and refrain from expressing himself in open session.

Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. The first question, Doctor: What is there about this project which causes the Board to exclude subsurface missiles, more particularly torpedoes?

Dr. COMPTON. Well, it doesn't exclude them, except in this way: The development of subsurface missiles of analogous types is already going on as part of the antisubmarine warfare campaign. But the type of facility that is needed for those is so different from this type of facility that there didn't seem to be any point in combining them.

Mr. COLE. Well——

Dr. COMPTON. Those underwater missiles are essentially of short range and do not need a long-range testing station.

Mr. COLE. But the scientific principles involved may be the same?

Dr. COMPTON. There are many that are similar. The underwater problem is somewhat more difficult because you can't send radio signals very well through the water. That gives the big opportunity to the air. But except for that limitation, they are essentially similar.

Mr. COLE. In your statement you referred or used an expression, the "seeing eye." This may be a question you don't care to answer in open session. Wasn't the "seeing eye" one of the proven developments of this war?

Dr. COMPTON. It did get into very limited experimental use; yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. So that when you refer to the possibility of the "seeing eye" you really mean the development and the perfection of what has already been established as a possibility?

Digitized by Google

Dr. COMPTON. Yes; that is right.

Mr. COLE. But there isn't so much speculation with respect to the "seeing eye" phase of it——

Dr. COMPTON. Yes. I think it is perfectly proper to say on the record because I think it is generally known. One of the possibilities of the "seeing eye" would be the possibility of carrying a television set in the nose.

Mr. COLE. Did the Board in connection with its consideration of the need for the problem consider the location for the project?

Dr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. And did the Board approve of the location for this project?

Dr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Anderson wants me to ask you where it is, and I know that is one of the questions that I mustn't ask.

Dr. COMPTON. I would rather wait until we are in executive session, and I think somebody else had better answer that.

Mr. COLE. But you indicated in your statement that the hazards involved in making these tests were comparatively negligible. If that is so, I am curious to know why it is necessary for us to be so extremely selective in the location of the project?

Dr. COMPTON. Well, perhaps I didn't make myself clear, Mr. Cole. I think the hazards are negligible in very large part because an area of this sort is selected.

In spite of anything I said, if you flew a guided missile over Washington or New York City I wouldn't say the hazard would be negligible at all in spite of the other precautions. One of the precautions that makes it safe is the selection of an appropriate area.

Mr. COLE. Of course, there are ample opportunities—I withdraw the question.

Dr. COMPTON. I might say this, perhaps in further answer. The limitations of the existing three ranges that General Richardson mentioned—at least in two of those ranges—have to do with the fact that there are surrounding built-up areas where it isn't deemed safe to send the missile.

Mr. COLE. After this new range is developed, assuming it is, what will become of the three existing ranges?

Dr. COMPTON. They would continue to be used.

For example, the one down at White Sands was originally developed to test rockets—rather than long-range guided missiles. It will certainly continue to be used for testing either short-range guided missiles or long-range missiles that are shot straight up rather than far out horizontally. That program is exceedingly active.

Right beside that there is the Holloman Air Base, which is also being used for testing guided missiles. The work load there is already so heavy that there has been very great difficulty in synchronizing the work at the two places so that they don't interfere with each other. That combination is already overloaded with short-range work.

Mr. COLE. Is it a field of proper inquiry for me to ask the range which you visualize as being within the realm of possibility for these guided missiles?

Dr. COMPTON. It is a hard question to answer, sir. Certainly I should say 5,000 miles is within the range of possibility, but as to whether it would be worth while using at a range of that length would depend on how accurate the control devices are.

Digitized by Google

Let me give this answer. Suppose you take one of our existing aircraft, like the one that flew nonstop to Honolulu and back. That could be used as a guided missile if you had automatic controls instead of pilots in the machine. That would be one. Now, That has a range—I don't know what it is, but it is well over 5,000 miles; perhaps seven or eight thousand. That could be a guided missile. But it would be very inefficient to use that as a guided missile unless you can direct it from your outside control accurately enough on the target so the damage you do to the enemy's economy is greater than the damage you have done to your own in the cost of producing missiles. So it is questions of that sort, I think, that determine the feasibility as to range it is largely questions of economy.

Mr. COLE. Wouldn't the range also be determined in a large measure by the size of the warhead; that is, by the load?

Dr. COMPTON. Oh, yes; that is true.

Mr. COLE. Now, can you estimate the size of the load for a range of 3,000 miles?

Dr. COMPTON. Well, it is possible. I know it can carry a 10-ton load.

Mr. COLE. For 3,000 miles?

Dr. COMPTON. Yes; that is, if your guided missile is something like one of our existing heavy bomber aircraft.

Now, if you are thinking of a supersonic guided missile, I don't know whether you could make it that heavy or not. At least it hasn't been done yet.

Mr. COLE. Perhaps——

Dr. COMPTON. But the really important thing is to find out or develop methods of accurate dropping on the target; that is delivery, on the target.

Mr. COLE. Have we succeeded in developing a guided missile, irrespective of range?

Dr. COMPTON. Oh, yes; yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Is it a matter of secrecy to know the range of that missile? If there is any doubt in your mind——

Dr. COMPTON. I am not quite certain of that.

Mr. COLE. I better withdraw it.

Did the Board consider at all the cost phases of this project?

Dr. COMPTON. We did; yes.

Mr. COLE. And——

Dr. COMPTON. You mean of this proposed test range?

Mr. COLE. Yes.

Dr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Is it the unanimous opinion of the Board that this testing range is not only sorely needed in the interest of national security but that it is economically justified from the standpoint of cost?

Dr. COMPTON. That is true. It is the best solution we have been able to find of this problem and we feel as a long-range development program—and by that I mean something that will be particularly important in the direction of warfare—say, from 5 years from now on—that this is essential.

If we were thinking about a war breaking out in 1951 or something of that sort, then this would not be essential. But as part of the complete military program of preparedness, we think it is an exceedingly important thing.

Digitized by Google

We are also convinced that the plans that have been developed are well thought out and certainly our Board knows of no improvement that can be made in them at this stage.

Mr. COLE. And to make sure of the Board's recommendation, it is true that the Board has approved of this particular location?

Dr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. That is all.

Mr. BROOKS. Any further questions from any members of the committee in open session? [No response.]

Doctor, I would like to ask you one or two questions which I think could be handled in open session.

I just want to ask you this: It is true, is it not, that because of the requirements which are set forth in these statements made by the witnesses, the location of such a plant as contemplated naturally has its difficulties and the areas where it might be located are very, very limited?

Dr. COMPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. That is correct, isn't it?

Dr. COMPTON. That is true.

Mr. BROOKS. I think that is all I wanted to ask.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one question. I presume this should be directed, however, to General Fairchild rather than to Dr. Compton.

Does this $200,000 contained in this bill contemplate that that is the eventual cost of this project?

General FAIRCHILD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is the eventual cost when you have your community of 13,000 people fully established and the range entirely completed?

General FAIRCHILD. Yes, sir; I believe that is correct.

General RICHARDSON. That is correct, sir. That is the over-all cost provided we expand to the maximum possible workload. We don't contemplate anything like that initially, however.

Mr. ANDERSON. One other question in that same connection.

Will there be only one request made by the joint services for this amount of $200,000,000, or will the request come through the various branches of the services, before the Appropriations Committee?

General RICHARDSON. No, sir. It will be contained in one request. We will keep this project as a separate project throughout, in order to avoid any confusion with respect to it.

Mr. ANDERSON. It will be one single request, then?

General RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. For the joint services for $200,000,000?

General RICHARDSON. No, sir, there will be no request for $200,000,000 at one time.

Mr. ANDERSON. No, not at one time.

Over what length of time?

General RICHARDSON. Possibly over 10 years, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. Over a 10-year period?

General RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

The project is being visualized as being split up in three phases. The first phase would be the minimum requirements to begin operations. That is a matter which would require, we estimate, about $60,000,000 over a period of about 3 years. We will stop then and use that much of it until the workload builds up to require expansion. The $200,000,000 ceiling includes phases 2 and 3, which are expansions to take care of an additional workload if it develops.

Mr. ANDERSON. I see. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROOKS. If there are no further questions then the committee will go into executive session——

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, on that point raised by Mr. Anderson, or the answer which the general has given to the point raised by Mr. Anderson——

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. You expect to spend $60,000,000 over the next 3 years?

General RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE. Then, would you have any serious objection to limiting this authorization to $60,000,000, so that 3 years from now the Congress can take a look at world conditions and military requirements and see whether they want to appropriate any more?

General RICHARDSON. We would prefer, sir, to receive the authorization for the eventually visualized facility. But our primary objective is to get into operation at the earliest possible date. So any solution that was arrived at by the Congress to permit us to do that would be satisfactory, sir.

Mr. COLE. Well, I will word it differently. Would it interfere seriously with your program if the amount were fixed at $60,000,000?

General RICHARDSON. No, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Rivers.

Mr. RIVERS. In that connection, I think Dr. Compton made the statement that the economies involved would always be re-evaluated and reviewed, is that correct?

General RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. To see whether the Nation can stand it.

General RICHARDSON. That is correct, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. So that would answer the question there.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, if there are no further questions, we will go into executive session.

(Whereupon, at 11 a. m., the committee went into executive session.)

SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS ON S. 632 TO AUTHORIZE CERTAIN PERSONNEL AND FORMER PERSONNEL OF THE NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT TO ACCEPT CERTAIN GIFTS AND A FOREIGN DECORATION TENDERED BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE No. 3,
Tuesday, February 15, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham (chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The next bill is S. 632.

(S. 632 is as follows:)

AN ACT To authorize certain personnel and former personnel of the Naval Establishment to accept certain gifts and a foreign decoration tendered by foreign governments

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following-named members and former members of the naval service are hereby authorized to accept such gifts as have been tendered them by foreign governments as of the date of approval of this Act: Rear Admiral Harold M. Martin, United States Navy; Captain William R. Frost, United States Naval Reserve; Captain Bennett W. Wright, United States Navy; Captain George C. Wright, United States Navy; Captain Richard W. Bubble, United States Navy; Commander Robert F. Carmody, United States Navy; Commander James I. Cone, United States Navy; Commander Jack Dean, United States Navy; Commander Gordon Fowler, United States Navy; Commander Richard L. Fowler, United States Navy; Commander John E. Hausman, United States Navy; Commander Draper L. Kauffman, United States Navy; Commander James A. Knowlton, United States Naval Reserve; Commander John P. Lunger, United States Navy; Commander Robert M. Milner, United States Navy; Commander Frank G. Raysbrook, United States Navy; Commander Frederick M. Stiesberg, United States Navy; Commander William A. Stuart, United States Navy; Commander Richard S. Rogers, United States Navy; Commander George R. Lee, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander Raymond A. Boyd, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander Laurenca B. Green, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander Melvin C. Hoffman, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander Victor A. Moitoret, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander John C. O'Connor, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander Henry Nelson, United States Naval Reserve; Lieutenant Commander Norman L. Paxton, United States Navy; Lieutenant Commander Byron G. Shepple, United States Navy; Captain James J. Bott, United States Marine Corps; Lieutenant Irwin J. Vanderswag, United States Marine Corps; Lieutenant George H. Belk, United States Navy; Lieutenant Samuel Hopkins, Junior, United States Navy; Lieutenant Jack Scott, United States Navy; Lieutenant (junior grade) La Verne W. Brown, Junior, United States Navy; Lieutenant (junior grade) Leonard B. Di Napoli, United States Navy; Lieutenant (junior grade) Thomas L. Neilson, United States Navy; Lieutenant (junior grade) Horace A. Thomsen, United States Navy; Ensign Robert P. Armstrong, United States Navy; Chief Boatswain Anthony S. Ciccone, United States Navy; Boatswain Earl L. Hause, United States Navy; Joseph G. Pardovich, chief boatswain's mate, United States Navy; Robert D. Clendenon, chief musician, United States Navy; Carl F. Heine, chief machinist's mate, United States Navy; Gilbert H. Dobler, chief photographer's mate, United States Navy; Myrl A. Yeaman, chief photographer's mate, United States Navy; Crisanto Dolor, chief cook, United States Navy; Master Sergeant Lionel E. Simmons, United States Marine Corps; Willie F. Maguire, chief signalman, United States Navy; Donald K. Lobdell, chief radioman, United States Navy; Gorman "T" Perry, motor machinist's mate, first class, United States Navy; Jack O. Montgomery, boatswain's mate, second class, United States Navy; Charles R. Dickinson, boatswain's mate, third class, United States Navy; Lawrence H. Wasser, musician, third class, United States Navy; Gordon C. Wyman, fire controlman, third class, United States Navy; Robert Charles Vail, shipfitter, third class, United States Navy; Delmere B. Blackburn, private, first class, United States Marine Corps; Paul Hermann, seaman, first class, United States Navy; James E. McCall, seaman, first class, United States Navy; Charles H. Kilpatrick, seaman, first class, United States Navy; Clifford E. Kintner, seaman, first class, United States Navy; Bernard I. Landau, seaman, first class, United States Navy; Harold A. Masters, seaman, first class, United States Navy; Kenneth Karl Hrabal, seaman, first class, United States Navy; Nicholas Vignovich, seaman, first class, United States Naval Reserve; Leonard Stanley Tur, fireman, first class, United States Naval Reserve; L. R. Weedle, fireman, first class, United States Navy; R. N. Young, fireman, first class, United States Navy; and Michael Strusinski, coxswain, United States Naval Reserve.

SEC. 2. The following-named members of the naval service are hereby authorized to accept such awards as have been tendered them by foreign governments as of the date of the approval of the Act: Rear Admiral Edward W. Hansen, United States Navy; Captain Albert E. Fitzwilliam, United States Navy; and Lieutenant (junior grade) John E. Nichols, United States Navy.

SEC. 3. Doctor Mina S. Rees, a civilian employee of the Navy Department, is hereby authorized to accept and wear the King's Medal for Service in the Cause of Freedom which has been tendered her by the Government of Great Britain.

Passed the Senate February 8, 1949.

Mr. DURHAM. Captain McDill is the witness on this bill. Captain, you may proceed.

STATEMENT BY CAPT. A. S. McDILL, UNITED STATES NAVY OFFICE OF JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, NAVY DEPARTMENT

Captain MCDILL. Mr. Chairman, S. 632 is a bill to authorize certain personnel and former personnel of the Naval Establishment to accept certain gifts and a foreign decoration tendered by foreign governments.

The acceptance of these gifts and decorations, the committee will recall, is forbidden by the Constitution in article 1, section 9, clause 8 which recites that no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall without the consent of Congress accept any present, emolument, office, or title of any knid whatever from any king, prince, or foreign state.

The Navy Department has interpreted this to include enlisted men as well in the receipt of these gifts. Also personnel who are active, inactive, or retired are included, by departmental construction.

Mr. ARENDS. Captain, might I interject there just a moment to ask you a question. Why does this apply only to the Naval Establishment?

Captain MCDILL. It applies to everyone, sir. The Secretary of Defense, as a procedural matter, has authorized the Departments to take and present to Congress lists of their personnel in each Department.

Mr. ARENDS. In each Department?

Digitized by Google

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. Then there would be a separate bill for each department?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir. They are scrutinized by the Department of State, by the individual service Department concerned, and forwarded to Congress, in the nature of private relief legislation, without cross-coordination.

Mr. ARENDS. My only thought was: In dealing with this matter we will have to deal with three specific bills—one for each Department—instead of dealing with one.

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. That was the only purpose of my inquiry. Go ahead, sir.

Captain McDILL. At the present time there are certain gifts and decorations from foreign nations to personnel of the Naval Establishment that are being withheld by the Department of State, which is the depository in this case, pending appropriate legislation or obtaining the consent of Congress, in constitutional terms.

Now, these gifts include a barometer, gold watches, pieces of plate, and cigarette cases, awarded to naval personnel at various times since 1935. While the reason for giving three of these presents is unknown, the others are tokens of appreciation, such as those items the Danish Government presented to two naval officers for training Danish personnel at the naval air station in Jacksonville, Fla.

The Icelandic Government gave 10 awards for the aid to the Icelandic motor vessel Laxfoss on January 10, 1944, when a Navy invasion boat rescued the passengers and crew of that vessel when she was stranded by night off Reykjavik during a severe snowstorm.

Prince Saud of the Saudi Arabian Government has presented gifts to various officers and enlisted men of a naval task force recently in the Mediterranean.

These gifts are in keeping with the precedent created by similar gifts to the navies of other countries.

Foreign decorations involve the King's Medal for service in the cause of freedom awarded by the British Government to Dr. Mina S. Rees, the head of the Mathematics Branch of the Office of Naval Research, Navy Department, for her contributions in the field of mathematical research during World War II. Dr. Rees is the only civilian serving in the Navy Department in a civil-service status receiving an award.

Now, these gifts and decorations——

Mr. DURHAM. Do you interpret the present law as preventing civilians from receiving awards?

Captain McDILL. If they hold an office of trust or profit under the United States, sir.

Now, these gifts and decorations are at present in the custody of the State Department, pending congressional approval for their acceptance.

Other decorations included would be the Cross of Naval Merit by Peru and two awards of the Order of Naval Merit and Diploma by Brazil.

Enactment of this legislation would result in no cost to the Government. The Navy Department has been authorized to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the Naval Establishment, and the Bureau of the

Digitized by Google

Budget has stated there would be no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

There are a total of 71 naval personnel, including Dr. Rees. They are broken down into 2 rear admirals, 6 captains, 15 commanders, 8 lieutenant commanders, 9 lieutenants or junior grade lieutenants, 1 ensign, 2 warrants, and 28 enlisted men of various ratings, as well as Dr. Rees.

Mr. ARENDS. What is the total, did you say, Captain?

Captain MCDILL. 71.

Mr. DURHAM. What is going to happen in the future? Suppose somebody goes overseas and is given medals later on. Will this authorize their acceptance?

Captain MCDILL. No, sir; it will require additional legislation.

Mr. DURHAM. Each time?

Captain MCDILL. Each time, sir.

Procedurally this is what is done: When the State Department has received a number of them and scrutinized them as to their acceptance being appropriate in the interest of the United States, they will then refer them to the Navy Department with their approval and the Navy Department will seek the necessary consent.

Mr. DURHAM. Where do they get the authority, if present law prevents them from accepting these awards or medals to begin with?

Captain MCDILL. It is a matter of what might be termed international comity, sir. It would be undiplomatic to refuse to be present at a presentation. There would be a considerable loss of what the Chinese call face if the individual or the officer didn't appear.

Mr. DURHAM. Off the record.

(Statement by Mr. Durham made outside the record.)

Mr. ARENDS. Take this off the record, too.

(Statement by Mr. Arends made outside the record.)

Mr. HARLOW. I suggest that we go back on the record, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. On the record.

Mr. HARLOW. There is a substantial policy question involved in this which has been met many times by the Congress. This is not a new procedure in any way. However, there is always, in every one of these items, a policy question for the Congress to keep in mind.

The constitutional provision was established, of course, for a specific very fine purpose. That was to prevent the obligation of American military or diplomatic personnel overseas to foreign countries through their receipt of gifts.

Mr. DURHAM. How does the State Department handle this now?

Mr. HARLOW. The State Department, sir, is the depository where these gifts are received, until they can be legally accepted.

Mr. DURHAM. I mean, if something is tendered our diplomats, do they receive it under the present law and accept it? Is it theirs, or do they have to go through the procedure of getting special permission from the Congress?

Mr. HARLOW. It is my understanding that State Department personnel received these gifts and accepted them——

Mr. ARENDS. Members of the State Department——

Mr. HARLOW. From King Saud——

Captain MCDILL. I think we are talking at cross purposes. I believe your question was directed to: Can a diplomat receive such a gift?

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. That is right.
Captain MCDILL. He can, according to the Constitution, if he obins the consent of Congress. But—I would like this off the record cause I don't speak for the State Department——
Mr. DURHAM. Off the record.
(Statement by Captain McDill made outside the record.)
Mr. ARENDS. There has been a precedent for this bill many times the past?
Mr. HARLOW. It is a normal procedure to request congressional approval for this type of thing.
Mr. ARENDS. I can see how some of these things should be accepted.
Mr. HARLOW. Yet, on the other hand, sir, is the proposition that each one of these items the Congress legalizes the acceptance of a ft to American military personnel by foreign countries. Because is could lead to abuse is the reason for the constitutional provision. I don't mean to infer here, Mr. Chairman that the bill is undesirable. seek only to make the policy question very clear.
Mr. DURHAM. This bill would apply only to this group.
Mr. ARENDS. Seventy-one.
Mr. DURHAM. Of course, we would require further legislation if other group came in.
Mr. HARLOW. Yes, sir.
Mr. DURHAM. But I would like to know what the policy of the State epartment is. Now, a clerk receives his emoluments and his pay om the United States. Is he restricted by the same provision of w that the man in the service is, or the civilian personnel that you entioned here in regard to the mathematics award?
Mr. HARLOW. Yes, sir.
Mr. DURHAM. He comes under the same law?
Mr. HARLOW. It is a constitutional provision; yes, sir.
Mr. DURHAM. Well, have they ever asked for any special legislaon—the State Department—from the Congress?
Mr. HARLOW. I do not know, sir. I have never seen one, but I nnot say that it has never been done.
The services, however, have always followed this practice of obtaing congressional approval in specific instances.
I do raise the question here—in one place the Navy Department tes very frankly that it does not know why three of these gifts ere tendered.
Mr. DURHAM. Why what?
Mr. HARLOW. Why three of these gifts were tendered. The urpose of the constitutional provision requiring the Departments to ome to the Congress on these matters was to insure that the Congress ould understand precisely why the gifts were tendered.
I gather—and the captain will correct me if I am mistaken—that hose who received the gifts for unknown purposes are included.
Captain MCDILL. That is correct.
Mr. HARLOW. And I question the wisdom of that as a precedent.
Mr. ARENDS. Well, why wouldn't the Department insist on knowng that?
Captain MCDILL. As I said, these gifts stem back to 1935, and it is ossible that the reason for presenting the gift to the individual was ot set out.

Digitized by Google

I have prepared here for the use of the committee a tabulation showing the individual, his rank, foreign government, and what the gift is.

Mr. ARENDS. Does that include the three that were just mentioned?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir; that includes everybody.

Mr. ARENDS. I see no reason why the recipient of such a gift shouldn't openly declare the reason why he was receiving it.

Captain McDILL. Oftentimes they do not know themselves. It is just a magnanimous gesture. For example, you are invited to lunch at Prince Saud's palace and at the conclusion of the lunch you are presented with a gold watch. I don't know that that happened in the case of the Arabian award, but often things like that do happen in these foreign countries.

Mr. SASSCER. This is off the record.

(Statement made by Mr. Sasscer outside the record.)

Mr. BLACKNEY. No constitutional amendment is necessary because Congress has the power, should it so desire, to approve the acceptance of a gift?

Captain McDILL. That is our understanding of coming to Congress to obtain the consent of that body.

Mr. BLACKNEY. Yes.

Mr. ARENDS. Captain, just read two or three of those items.

Captain McDILL. May I start off with Admiral Martin——

Mr. ARENDS. And will you put them in the record.

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. The compilation you have.

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Admiral Martin, from Prince Saud of the Saudi Arabian Government: He gets one brown camel hair ceremonial robe; one cashmere scarf; one gold thread head rope; one gold watch; one Arabian gold-hilted sword and scabbard; two Arabian horses, male and female, at present in the custody of Amir Bin Jiluwa at Saudi Arabia—Mr. Peurifoy denies they are in the State Department—and two Arab style cloth saddles.

Mr. SASSCER. When you say "in the custody of," do you mean they hold physical possession of the gift until it is approved by Congress?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. This is off the record.

(Statement by Mr. Durham made outside the record.)

Mr. HARLOW. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, there is also to be borne in mind the fact that this country has the Medal of Freedom which it bestows on foreign diplomats, as you know.

Mr. SASSCER. Isn't this practice more or less customary? This practice isn't confined to the military personnel of the United States. I assume that Prince Saud makes the same type of gifts to various other officers of different countries, such as Britain, France, and so forth.

Captain McDILL. That is correct, Mr. Sasscer.

Mr. SASSCER. As far as you know, they are accepted freely by those gentlemen?

Captain McDILL. They are, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. Read a couple of gifts that have been bestowed on the boys with lesser rank.

Digitized by Google

Captain McDILL. To Captain Brust, a piece of plate. To a Commander Carmody, a gold watch. Watches predominate. To a Commander Knowlton, an aneroid barometer, from Canada.

Among the enlisted men, gold watches from the Arabian Government and a cigarette case in the case of a chief machinist mate from the Icelandic Government. That seems to be about the scale of gifts: Gold watches from the Arabian Government and cigarette cases from Iceland.

Mr. DURHAM. Are you through, Captain?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Does that complete your statement?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS ON S. 673, RELATING TO THE PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL RESERVE PERFORMING ACTIVE DUTY IN THE GRADE OF REAR ADMIRAL, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3,
Tuesday, February 15, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham (chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The next bill is S. 673, companion bill to H. R. 2426. (S. 673 is as follows:)

[S. 673, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

AN ACT Relating to the pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve performing active duty in the grade of rear admiral, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any officer of the Naval Reserve serving in the grade of rear admiral shall receive the pay and allowances prescribed by law for rear admirals of the upper half when any officer of the active list of the line of the Regular Navy, junior to him, is in the upper half of the list of rear admirals: Provided, That the provisions of this Act shall not apply to officers of the Naval Reserve while on any lineal list established pursuant to title III of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947: Provided further, That no back pay or allowances shall be held to have accrued under the provisions of this Act for any period prior to the date of its approval.

Passed the Senate February 8, 1949.

Mr. DURHAM. Captain McDill?

Captain MCDILL. Commander Martineau will testify on this measure.

Mr. DURHAM. Oh, yes, Commander Martineau.

Commander MARTINEAU. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. Commander, will you give us the explanation of this bill and why it is needed.

Commander MARTINEAU. I shall try, sir.

I have a short statement which I would like to read and then submit to any questions that you might have.

STATEMENT BY COMMANDER DAVID L. MARTINEAU, BUREAU OF NAVAL PERSONNEL, NAVY DEPARTMENT

Commander MARTINEAU. Existing law permits Naval Reserve officers to attain the grade of rear admiral, but the Comptroller General has held that such officers may not receive the pay of the upper half under any conditions for the reason that no statutory provision affirmatively provides for it. Any rear admiral of the upper half receives the pay of a major general, while one of the lower half receives that of a brigadier general.

Section 315 of Public Law 381, Eightieth Congress, was intended to authorize upper half pay for any Reserve rear admiral assigned to a Regular Navy billet. However, the Comptroller General's office has advised that the language employed in the said section 315 is not adequate for that purpose.

Appropriate amendment to that section has been drafted for inclusion in other necessary amendments to Public Law 381.

The proposed amendment to Public Law 381 will not, however, apply to reservists on active duty in connection with the organization and administration of the Naval Reserve.

I should like to point out there, Mr. Chairman, that that category of reservists just referred to are not paid for out of the Regular Navy appropriation. There is a separate appropriation covering Naval Reserve organization, training, and administration, and reservists who are on active duty in connection with such training of Reserves are paid out of that appropriation.

Since there is now one rear admiral of the Naval Reserve on active duty in that status, with precedents of Regular Navy rear admirals entitled to upper half pay, this bill is proposed in order that the officer concerned as well as others who may be assigned to similar active duty may receive pay equal to that of other rear admirals with whom they have precedent on the lineal list.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, has already passed the Senate without amendment, a bill similar to the one now before you: H. R. 2426. However, it has been brought to our attention that there is probably a slight omission in the language of this bill that might be subject to a misinterpretation, and I suggest for the consideration of your committee that you consider this amendment:

In line 4 of the bill, after the word "shall" add a comma and insert the following words: "when otherwise entitled to receive active duty pay and allowances,".

The purpose of this amendment I have just suggested, Mr. Chairman, I believe is quite apparent to you and it is to prevent this bill, if it were enacted, from being interpreted in such a manner that any such naval reserve rear admiral regardless of whether he was on active duty would be entitled to get the full active duty pay.

Obviously the intent of the bill is only to give him this pay when he is entitled to it for active services rendered.

Mr. ARENDS. Commander was this question discussed at all in connection with the pay bill last year?

Commander MARTINEAU. Do you mean the Reserve pay bill?

Mr. ARENDS. Yes.

Commander MARTINEAU. Public Law 460?

Mr. ARENDS. Yes.

Commander MARTINEAU. Public Law 460, Mr. Arends, among other things, amended section 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, which is the basic authority for this, but the Comptroller General has ruled that that language is not appropriate.

It is really quite unjust if we were to say and to continue the practice that no rear admiral of the Naval Reserve could get the pay of the upper half. That would be just like telling the Army, for instance, hat no Army or Air Force reservist could ever receive the pay of a ıajor general.

Digitized by Google

This bill seeks to correct that situation.

This bill, I should also like to add, has been coordinated within the ;ational Military Establishment and is in accordance with the pro-ram of the President.

Mr. DURHAM. You have just one man to whom this would apply at he present time?

Commander MARTINEAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. One rear admiral?

Commander MARTINEAU. One rear admiral on active duty.

Mr. DURHAM. The bill would take care of future appointments in ıis position of rear admiral from the Reserve?

Commander MARTINEAU. When they obtain such seniority that ɔmeone junior to them in the Regular Navy——

Mr. DURHAM. He would have to qualify by seniority and precednce, with the Regular officer?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct.

Mr. DURHAM. All right.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman, the amendment suggested is, of ourse, necessary if the committee desires to report the bill.

I invite the committee's attention to the proviso on line 8, which -lates to the promotion bill—the Officer Personnel Act of 1947—hich states that this act will not apply to rear admirals who are on xtended active duty and on the lineal lists established by the Per-onnel Act.

The intent of that provision is to maintain a delineation between fficers paid under appropriations for the Naval Reserve and officers aid out of general appropriations for the Navy, and it was included ere for that purpose.

The reason I mention it at this point is to have the record show the act that it is not the intent of that provision, in itself, to preclude uch payments to such rear admirals who are on these lineal lists.

It is my understanding that the Navy Department will attempt to ponsor an amendment to the Officer Personnel Act during this ongress to insure that that act will also permit the pay of the upper alf to rear admirals on those lineal lists.

Otherwise, I can see no objection to the proposed bill, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Any questions, Mr. Sasscer?

Mr. SASSCER. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Blackney?

Mr. BLACKNEY. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Without objection, the bill as amended will be eported favorably to the full committee.

Is that all before the committee this morning?

Mr. HARLOW. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee is adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 10:55 a. m., the committee adjourned.)

TO PROVIDE FOR THE CONSTRUCTION, REHABILITATION, EXPANSION, CONVERSION, AND JOINT UTILIZATION OF BUILDINGS, STRUCTURES, UTILITIES, AND OTHER FACILITIES, INCLUDING THE ACQUISITION OF LAND, FOR THE RESERVE COMPONENTS OF THE NATIONAL MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES. (H. R. 2824) MR. RIVERS

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, February 10, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Army recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To provide for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and joint utilization of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land, for the reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Army.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to provide for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and joint utilization of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land, for the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, which the Department of the Army recommends be enacted into law. The Secretary of Defense has assigned responsibility for the preparation and submission of this measure on behalf of the National Military Establishment, to this Department.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to authorize the Secretary of Defense to provide for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and purchase or lease of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land or appropriate interest therein, as may be necessary to develop, train, equip, operate, and maintain the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States.

The shortage of buildings and other facilities has been one of the greatest obstacles in the implementation of the organization and training program of the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment. New construction and joint utilization of armories and facilities by all of the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment will alleviate present conditions.

Digitized by Google

No accurate estimate of the cost of the proposed legislation can be offered at this time. The execution of these plans will depend upon the strength and state of training of the Reserve components, and appropriations from year to year. The provisions of this bill with respect to joint utilization of facilities, under the supervision of the Secretary of Defense, will result in substantially smaller expenditures than would be required for programs of the several services individually.

This proposed legislation has been coordinated among the departments and boards in the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Bureau of the Budget has been consulted and advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM H. DRAPER, Jr., Army.

FULL COMMITTEE HEARING ON H. R. 2216, TO AMEND THE NATIONAL SECURITY ACT OF 1947 TO PROVIDE FOR AN UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Wednesday, February 16, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Dewey Short presiding.

Mr. SHORT. The committee will be in order.

Because this is a rather unusual procedure, I feel not only highly honored but almost embarrassed to be presiding on this committee—I suppose because our broad-minded, tolerant, and very generous chairman takes pity on a few of us in the minority.

I might say, Chairman Vinson, with your permission, at the outset, and for the benefit of the new members of the committee, that the older members of this committee who have followed very closely the activities of Secretary Forrestal through the trying war years, first as Under Secretary of the Navy, then as Secretary of the Navy, and particularly through this most difficult postwar period since the passage of the Unification Act, have admired his outstanding ability. We have only the deepest gratitude for the very valuable and efficient service that he has rendered. He has one of the toughest jobs, I think, in the whole Government.

The bill we have before us this morning, H. R. 2216, is a very short and a simple bill. If enacted into law, I think it will relieve the overburdened Secretary of our National Defense of many of the onerous duties and responsibilities that are now his. The legislation will not increase any of his powers, but it will allow him to share some of his burdens with the Under Secretary.

(H. R. 2216 is as follows:)

[H. R. 2216, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL TO AMEND THE NATIONAL SECURITY ACT OF 1947 TO PROVIDE FOR AN UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 202 of the National Security Act of 1947 approved July 26, 1947 (61 Stat. 495; 5 U. S. C., sec. 171a), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) There shall be an Under Secretary of Defense, who shall be appointed from civilian life by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall perform such duties, and shall exercise such powers, as the Secretary of Defense may prescribe. The Under Secretary shall act for, and exercise the powers of, the Secretary of Defense during his absence or disability."

SEC. 2. Subsection (a) of section 301 of such Act (5 U. S. C., sec. 171b), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The Under Secretary of Defense shall receive the compensation prescribed by law for Under Secretaries of executive departments."

Mr. SHORT. Now, Secretary Forrestal, the committee will be very happy to hear anything you have to say concerning this particular piece of legislation.

STATEMENT BY JAMES FORRESTAL, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Secretary FORRESTAL. Mr. Chairman, as always I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before this committee. I wish to record my appreciation of your remarks, and thank you for them.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this marks my first formal appearance before you at this session of Congress. Your full committee and its subcommittees have already held hearings, however, on a number of legislative items that are included in the over-all legislative program of the National Military Establishment. Among these items are the bill to provide authorized strengths for the Army and the Air Force, the bill to provide a "radar fence," and the bill to provide a long-range proving ground for guided missiles.

The bills I have just mentioned were approved by me for inclusion in our over-all legislative program, and were then delegated to one or the other of the three military Departments, with the designated Department having the responsibility for submitting the bill to Congress on behalf of the National Military Establishment as a whole.

I believe that this system of delegating to the military departments the responsibility for a large number of specific legislative items is working well. But both in the legislative field and elsewhere there are many matters which the Secretary of Defense cannot delegate to one of the departmental secretaries. Up to the present time, the Secretary of Defense has had to assume personal responsibility for all of these items that could not be delegated. The result, in terms of the carrying of the work load by any one individual, has not been good—and among my other recommendations for changes in the National Security Act, therefore, I have included a recommendation for an Under Secretary of Defense. And I am grateful for the opportunity to present very briefly my case for the passage of this bill.

In my annual report to the President and the Congress, I described my concept of an Under Secretary of Defense in the following words:

> The Under Secretary should exercise such responsibilities as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of Defense.

I think that corresponds with the language of the bill.

> The status of the Under Secretary as the alter ego of the Secretary and as the person who becomes Acting Secretary of Defense in the absence of the Secretary should be recognized.

The bill before you, H. R. 2216, provides for the creation of the position I have just been describing.

The need for an Under Secretary of Defense must be very clear to the members of this committee, since almost all of you have been in frequent contact with my office during the past year. The need for creation of the position of Under Secretary of Defense is so clear a need, in fact, that it probably requires only a brief presentation in support of the case.

Let me cite these facts. There are a large number of governmental bodies, or committees, on which the Secretary of Defense sits or attends meetings—I think the total is on the order of 16—and I should ke the privilege of submitting a list of some of the more important nes for the record, in order to complete my testimony.

Mr. SHORT. We will be glad to have it at this point.

(The data referred to is as follows:)

1. President's Cabinet.
2. National Security Council.
3. National Security Resources Board.
4. Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government.
5. War Council.
6. Committee of Four Secretaries.
7. Munitions Board.
8. Research and Development Board.
9. Several major interdepartmental subcommittees of the National Security Council.
10. Other ad hoc interdepartmental committees.

Secretary FORRESTAL. As I have just mentioned, there are a large number of bodies, or committees, on which the Secretary of Defense sits, beginning with the Cabinet, and then going through other bodies such as the National Security Council, the National Security Resources Board, the War Council, and about 12 others, all of which require detailed attention, a great deal of preparatory work, and work which in most cases cannot be delegated.

He must be available for conferences with the Secretaries of the three Departments of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

He is responsible for the preparation of the military budget—for its submission to the President, and for oral testimony in the course of hearings by the Congress in connection with the amounts to be appropriated.

He must be available for testimony before congressional committees on a broad area of legislative items of over-all concern to the Military Establishment.

He must take the initiative in a great many fields which do not receive great public attention, but which are basic to the progress of unification—fields such as the preparation of a uniform code of military justice, which will come before your committee in due course, and I think upon which you have already been informed; common hospital and medical practices, and the solution of such problems as the current one stemming from the shortage of doctors and dentists, which is a very serious one for the services; supervision of planning in such fields as civilian defense, protection against methods of unconventional warfare; and the preparation of a legislative program for the National Military Establishment as a whole.

I may say, in passing, that one of the purposes of unification, of course, was to secure economy. The methods of securing economy are a complex and difficult task. We have taken substantial steps in achieving economies. The total measured against the whole subject is not impressive when I say that I am talking in terms of 25 to 50 million dollars, but it is the beginning process, and it has to be attacked not with an ax but by a process of selection and care.

Mr. SHORT. At least you are heading in the right direction.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I believe so, Mr. Short.

In addition, during the past year I have had to spend a substantial part of my time in getting individuals to come to Washington on particular assignments. As you gentlemen know, it is much easier to talk about the desirability of efficiency and competence in the Federal Government than it is to secure the individuals to implement such plans. During the past year I have had to secure, or assist the President in securing, a replacement for Mr. Hargrave as Chairman of the Munitions Board, and a replacement for Dr. Bush as Chairman of the Research and Development Board. We had to get an individual to conduct a very thorough study on civilian defense, a job which was ably done by Mr. Russell Hopley. Likewise, an experienced person is required to head the Armed Forces Medical Advisory Committee, which is now dealing with the very complex problems of the medical services. The individual secured was Mr. Charles P. Cooper, head of the Medical Center, New York City.

These are only a few of the places that have to be filled by competent people. Filling most of them required a long and painstalking search, before we found the combination of competence, availability, and above all a willingness to accept the responsibility.

I don't mean to imply that there was any lack of patriotism or zeal; but the combination of the time of life which happens to apply to most men that you seek for—which is a time in which they are already engaged in many and serious responsibilities in their own communities—considerations of health and of drafts upon their time and effort make it difficult to secure their services. And each of those instances requires a rather substantial amount of time and persuasive effort.

In the case of the Munitions Board, I believe it is fair to say that I talked directly or through other persons with not less than 50 people before deciding to draft the services of an extremely competent man, Mr. Donald Carpenter, who was already with us in the capacity of Chairman of the Military Liaison Committee to the Atomic Energy Commission.

A recital of difficulties is not always the best way to demonstrate the need for additioal help, but in this case the facts are so massive that I feel justified in citing them.

The entire weight of the Military Establishment focuses upon the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and there is no way of deflecting those responsibilities. The creation of the position of Under Secretary is far from being the entire solution to the working out of the problems of the Military Establishment, but it will strengthen civilian control and will go a long way toward furnishing part of the immediate help which is needed.

Some of the other highly important things which are also needed were outlined by me in my annual report to the President and the Congress, and need not be repeated here. President Truman will in the very near future submit to Congress his recommendations in this field. And, of course, that will receive the consideration or your committee.

To the best of my knowledge, all who have looked into our organization for national security have come to the conclusion that there is a very real need for an Under Secretary of Defense; and I hope, therefore, that it will be possible for you to take early and favorable action on H. R. 2216.

Mr. SHORT. Chairnam Vinson, I think it perhaps would be appropriate and helpful at this point to have Mr. Smart read just two or three paragraphs of the recommendation of the Eberstadt task force under the Hoover Commission. It devoted many weeks of serious study to this particular question, and I would like to have it in the record.

Mr. VINSON. All right.

Mr. SHORT. Just read excerpts from the Eberstadt report, corroborating what the Secretary just told us.

Mr. SMART. And with your permission, Mr. Short, I think it might be appropriate to insert a roster of the outstanding citizens who served on the Eberstadt task force.

Mr. SHORT. By all means.

Mr. SMART. And who issued this report. [Reading:]

COMMITTEE ON THE NATIONAL SECURITY ORGANIZATION

Chairman, Mr. F. Eberstadt, F. Eberstadt & Co., Inc., 39 Broadway, New York 6, N. Y.
Dr. Raymond B. Allen, president, University of Washington, Seattle 5, Wash.
Mr. Thomas Archer, vice president, General Motors Corp., Detroit, Mich.
Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin, the New York Times, New York, N. Y.
Mr. Chester I. Barnard, president, the Rockefeller Foundation, New York, N. Y.
Dr. Charles W. Cole, president, Amherst College, Amherst, Mass.
Mr. John Cowles, president, the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, Minneapolis, Minn.
Mr. James Knowlson, president, Stewart-Warner Corp., Chicago 14, Ill.
Mr. John J. McCloy, president, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, Washington 25, D. C.
Dr. Frederick A. Middlebush, president, the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo.
Mr. Robert P. Patterson, Patterson, Belknap & Webb, 1 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.
Mr. Lewis L. Strauss, Commission member, Atomic Energy Commission, Washington 25, D. C.
Mr. J. Carlton Ward, Jr., chairman of the board, Fairchild Engine & Airplane Corp., 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N. Y.
Gen. Robert E. Wood, chairman of the board, Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago, Ill.

The Committee on the National Security Organization, a so-called task force of the Hoover Commission, whose members are enumerated on the foregoing page, made certain recommendations in their report relating to the National Military Establishment. Some of these recommendations related to the Office of the Secretary of Defense. In volume 1, page 96, the Committee states:

"A Committee study of the Secretary's schedule over a period of 30 days shows him working intolerable hours under an inordinate press of all kinds of matters. It is apparent that even as industrious and able a man as Secretary Forrestal could not continue under such a schedule, particularly in time of war; while its most disturbing feature is that it allows him inadequate opportunity for thought and reflection. It is, unfortunately, impossible to supply the Secretary with days of more than 24 hours each, but he can be provided with the assistance and organization which will free his hours from minor and routine claims and enable him to deal more effectively with major ones."

On page 97, the Committee states:

"In order to relieve him [Secretary of Defense] of an impossible burden of work, the Secretary should be provided with a civilian Under Secretary and with stronger staff and organizational assistance than he now enjoys."

On the same page, in section 28, the committee states:

"Creation of an Under Secretary of Defense to act as the Secretary's deputy and assistant in all matters of concern to him is essential. On this there was practically complete unanimity of testimony before the committee. The Under Secretary of Defense should be, so to speak, the understudy and general manager for the Secretary of Defense. He should be next to the Secretary of Defense in line of command and succession and should be the Acting Secretary of Defense—with all the powers and responsibilities thereof—in the Secretary's absence. The Committee believes it inadvisable that his responsibilities should be specifically prescribed by statute. He should perform such duties and functions as may from time to time be assigned to him by the Secretary of Defense."

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. PHILBIN. I move the bill be favorably reported.

Mr. VINSON. Wait 1 minute.

Mr. BROOKS. Is there any opposition to it, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. VINSON. I do not think there is any opposition, but there might be some inquiry.

Let me ask Mr. Smart this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. VINSON. Is any statement made by the Eberstadt Committee with reference to the rank of the Under Secretary, when he is not serving in lieu of the Secretary, as to his standing with the other three Under Secretaries?

Mr. SMART. No, sir.

Mr. VINSON. What about that, Mr. Secretary, because that question will arise in the services?

Secretary FORRESTAL. It will arise.

My own feeling, Mr. Chairman, is that he should rank the other Secretaries in line of authority, although I think the question would only arise practically, in all probability, in the absence of the Secretary. But this individual must be capable of receiving the delegated powers of the Secretary, to give him the position to carry forward programs.

Mr. VINSON. I understand thoroughly, Mr. Secretary, when he is acting in your place, of course, he has the rank, and he is the head. But, now, when you are here, and he is here, and the other Under Secretaries are here, where would he stand with reference to the Under Secretaries in the other three Departments? I think that ought to be cleared up.

Secretary FORRESTAL. My own recommendation would be that he would outrank the Secretaries of the three Departments.

Mr. VINSON. All right. I think the record should show that it is the sense of the committee, as well as that of the Secretary, that he would rank the other Under Secretaries.

Mr. SHORT. Not merely when the Secretary is out of the country but also when they are both here.

Mr. VINSON. That is right, when they are both here. I think that ought to be clearly established.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I should like to say that where there are meetings or conferences which I delegate to the Under Secretary I feel that he would have to have the power of presiding over any group.

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Secretaries, Under Secretaries, or whatever.

Mr. VINSON. Then, your thought would be that he would take precedence, and he would rank the Under Secretaries in the other three Departments?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Yes, sir. I think in meetings, Mr. Chairman, he would also have to have the power—I will not say the power—but he would have to have the precedence to preside where the Secretaries of the Departments were involved.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Secretary, I notice that in this bill there is no requirement that the Under Secretary shall not have been an officer on active duty within the past 10 years, which requirement, of course, prevails so far as the Secretary of Defense itself is concerned. I have no objection to that, but I am just wondering what your views are about it.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, I think to carry out the spirit of the act, and also the spirit of the traditional concept of the relation of our civilians to the military, it would probably be a good thing to make the same restriction, although in general terms I would like to see this kept as simple as possible, and with as little qualifications as we can get into it.

I think it would flow actually from the legislative record of the discussion of this whole Unification Act that it is clearly the will of the Congress to have civilian control, which means that they do not want any military officer to be either Secretary of Defense or Under Secretary.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. VINSON. You would not interpose any objection to amending it, in reference to that limitation?

Secretary FORRESTAL. No, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Mr. SHORT. Yes. Mr. Brooks.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Secretary, what powers of delegation would the Under Secretary have?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Of delegation of his authority?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. You have a tough legal problem there now.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I am not a lawyer, Mr. Brooks.

Mr. BROOKS. I think it is a very important thing, though, because I can conceive this, where the Under Secretary may delegate someone to carry out some authority which you gave the Under Secretary, and you may come to a very important situation as to whether or not his representative has a definite rank, too.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, I think it is clear in the relationship existing between the Secretary of Defense and this official, that that relationship would have to be so close that he would always be executing the policies of the Secretary of Defense.

I do not believe, unless you allowed a cleavage and a separation of those two individuals to arise, that there would be any practical question.

Mr. BROOKS. You do not think there would be any real powers of delegation, then?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, take the question of industrial mobilization, or take the question of the budget. If the Secretary of Defense assigned responsibility, for example, for the method of preparation of the budget, that would be a delegation of responsibility and work. But there is always the recourse of appeal if the other Departments do not concur with the results. There would be no cutting across that.

Mr. BROOKS. You mean there would be an appeal to you?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. Over the head of the Under Secretary?

Secretary FORRESTAL. That is right.

But if this man is to be useful he has got to have not only the full confidence but the full support of the Secretary of Defense.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RIVERS. In that connection why could not you say he would have the delegation of all powers by and with the approval of the Secretary?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Delegation of powers approved by the Secretary?

Mr. RIVERS. By and with the approval of the Secretary. Then you would cut all of that. If he would supersede any of those, then the appeal would be forthcoming as a matter of right.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, I would prefer, when this position is created, to see those powers developed out of the experience of the office, rather than to try to predict in advance what you wanted to assign it.

Mr. RIVERS. Because we ran into the same thing Mr. Brooks is talking about yesterday on the guided-missile bill, about the delegation of authority, where you delegated the Secretary of the Air Force to operate the guided-missile problem.

Secretary FORRESTAL. That might be a practice that would grow up in the form that you would follow.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. I just wanted to ask some of the good lawyers on the committee if it is not the general rule that a delegated power cannot be delegated?

Mr. ELSTON. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. So if you delegate the power to the Under Secretary, while he would be able to use others for the administrative details—the spade work and that sort of thing—when it came to the exercise of the power delegated to him he could not delegate the power, as such, to another.

Is not that the way we want it?

Secretary FORRESTAL. In essence, Mr. Kilday, it seems to me that most of the work and the activity of the Under Secretary of Defense would take the form of recommendations to the Secretary of Defense.

Mr. KILDAY. That is right.

Secretary FORRESTAL. And by——

Mr. KILDAY. Except in his absence.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Yes; and by implication that carries the necessary power and authority.

Mr. KILDAY. I was wondering whether it would weaken or strengthen the bill to say whether he would act for and in the name of the Secretary. But I doubt whether we should complicate it.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I defer to the judgment of your legal colleagues on the committee.

I think it would accomplish the purpose probably if you said he was in the absence of the Secretary the ranking member of the Military Establishment.

Mr. KILDAY. We do that.

Mr. VINSON. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. RIVERS. But he would have that when you are absent.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Secretary, answering my colleague here, however, that official would not be an official with delegated authority because he would be an official with statutory authority, under the words of the statute "shall exercise such power as the Secretary of Defense may prescribe."

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. That is a delegated power.

Mr. RIVERS. That is delegated, right there.

Mr. KILDAY. Then, we do want him to delegate it on down the line, even to a clerk.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I say he should have only such powers as the Secretary would permit him to delegate.

Secretary FORRESTAL. It seems to me the language that Mr. Brooks just read is pretty satisfactory.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right, right there.

Secretary FORRESTAL. You cannot go on delegating down to the last person in the office.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Secretary, you made a statement that in appointing boards upon which probably the three Secretaries might be members, he would properly preside over a board. Therefore, he would act as chairman of that board. Don't you think that probably might cause a little embarrassment or a little difficulty?

Secretary FORRESTAL. It would depend on the personality, I think, and the competence of the man himself. I think if he acted with tact and consideration there would be no difficulty. And that, it seems to me, must run through and pervade this whole business.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Cole.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Secretary, section 203 of the National Security Act says that officers of the military services may be assigned to the Secretary of Defense as his personal aides and assistants. Do you feel that that opportunity should be made available to the Under Secretary, or not?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Yes; I think so. I think he should be able to draw upon any ability or talent that he would find useful in carrying out his missions.

Mr. COLE. Do you suggest that in order to do that it would be necessary to amend that section I referred to?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Again, I defer to your legal judgment, Mr. Cole. But I do not think it is necessary. I think it is implicit in the relationship that this official would bear to the Secretary of Defense.

Mr. COLE. But you see it reads:

* * * officers of the armed services may be detailed to duty as assistants and personal aides to the Secretary of Defense, but he shall not establish a military staff.

Now, there might come a question of interpretation from the Comptroller General, or some place along the line, that if in the exercise of your authority you instruct certain officers to work with the Under Secretary that might be an improper or extra legal exercise of your authority?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well——

Mr. COLE. If you feel that the Under Secretary should have the opportunity of having military aides, the same as you do, I think we better put it into the law.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, I would have no objection to it, Mr. Cole, but it does not seem to me to be necessary.

Mr. COLE. Well, do you feel rather strongly on the subject of whether he should have aides, or not?

Digitized by Google

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, out of my own experience, it is clear that any official in my post, or in this particular place, should have the right to use whatever he needs to carry out his responsibilities.

Mr. COLE. Well, I do not take it that section 203 was designed for that purpose. In the exercise of your authority as Secretary you have the right, of course, to call on anybody. But this authorized you to establish, as it says, a military personal aide.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, it is in the same sense that General Eisenhower is acting now as a consultant and adviser to me.

Mr. COLE. I will leave it up to you. Do you want us to amend the act, or not? I merely raise the question for consideration at this time, because if it should be done now is the time to do it.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I think the language is broad enough, Mr. Cole, to permit such action if he decides to take it.

Mr. COLE. You do not feel that section 203 should be amended?

Secretary FORRESTAL. May I communicate with the Chairman on that point?

Mr. SHORT. You would amend it, Mr. Cole, by simply adding the "Under Secretary," making it the "Secretary and Under Secretary"?

Mr. VINSON. That is right, exactly.

Mr. SHORT. Perhaps you should spell it out.

Mr. VINSON. And that is at least, Mr. Chairman, carrying out the spirit of the original act.

Mr. SHORT. You see, we never had this as a new office. It was not in existence when the law was written.

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Mr. SHORT. So I can see no harm in spelling it out.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I was just thinking this. When the Office of the Under Secretary of the Navy was created, which, of course, is a somewhat different case, there was no specific allocation or denial. I never fet any restraint.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, that was due to the reason that there was no restricted jurisdiction.

Secretary FORRESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON. But here, in this bill, there is a restricted jurisdiction.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Yes.

Mr. VINSON. The sum and substance of it all is that you cannot delegate to him any more powers than you have yourself.

Secretary FORRESTAL. That is right.

Mr. VINSON. So it might be, if this was not put in, that you could.

Mr. KILDAY. But would not you run into this danger of statutory construction, that you would thereby limit it to this particular thing and nothing else? Having mentioned one, it would exclude all others.

Mr. GAVIN. Read it again, will you, please, Mr. Cole?

Mr. COLE (reading):

> Officers of the armed services may be detailed to duty as assistants and personal aides to Secretary of Defense, but he shall not establish a military staff.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I think the sense of this bill is that whatever powers and privileges I may have, whatever talents I can tap in the Military Establishment, would be equally available to the Under Secretary.

Mr. SHORT. You cannot delegate any more than you have.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I would not think so.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SHORT. It is broad enough to include it. He simply is a standby and acts in your stead.

Secretary FORRESTAL. That seems to me to be sensible.

Mr. SHORT. I think it is broad enough to cover it.

Mr. RIVERS. And, of course, during the war, Mr. Secretary, you not have a great deal of trobule—you had some trouble, but you did not have a great deal of trouble—like you would have in peacetime on the delegated powers in connection with the General Accounting Office. We want to fix it so that whenever you give a man a job he will not have to be running to you every 2 or 3 minutes during the day and worrying you to death. That is the reason for this authority.

Secretary FORRESTAL. That is right.

Mr. SHORT. It seems to me the intent is very clear and convincing. At the top of page 2 it states:

The Under Secretary shall act for and exercise the powers of the Secretary of Defense during his absence or disability.

Secretary FORRESTAL. That seems to me——

Mr. SHORT. That is broad enough to cover it.

Secretary FORRESTAL. So it seems to me, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, I again move that the bill be favorably reported.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, there is another question or two that I would like to ask. I feel quite certain that the question will be asked when the bill is presented over on the floor.

The act now gives you three assistants; that is, Secretaries or assistants. Why is it that the responsibilities you envision to delegate to the other Secretaries cannot be handled by one of your present available Secretaries?

Secretary FORRESTAL. I think it is inherent in the fact that the three men I have as special assistants are men of great competence and industry. However, the title of "special assistant" to any official in Government does not carry with it the weight and the prestige sufficient to permit those individuals to preside over meetings and to carry out the necessary task that I have to get help on. I mean, for example, there are tasks such as the task of representing me on the National Security Council, possibly, or on the Resources Board, as well as others, and it must be somebody who has sufficient prestige and weight back of him.

I do not derrogate the intelligence of my special assistants. It is of a very high order, but I cannot send those gentlemen to represent me at governmental meetings, or delegate them tasks that involve relationships with other departments, except on committee work and work of that character.

Mr. COLE. Could another reason be that the work that these three special assistants are now doing is such that there is not opportunity for them to do this other work?

Sedretary FORRESTAL. Well, they are overloaded with work. I am frank to say I never realized the tremendous amount of matters of common interest that focus about this office. Take the question of military pay, take the question of the hospitals, take the question of doctors and dentists, take the question of a common code of military justice—all of those involve long, detailed studies, and they require the attention and the hard and assiduous effort of men. You cannot combine that type of work with the broad administrative work this gentleman would have to carry.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. VINSON. Along the lines of the first question by Mr. Cole with reference to section 203, while he might have the authority to establish some kind of military staff in the Under Secretary's office, you do not construe that the intent of Congress would be that he would have the authority to do so and it would not be done?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, I have been scrupulous, Mr. Chairman, in trying not to go against the will of Congress on the question of a military staff. I have come to the conclusion that whether you call it a staff or not—I think the words "military staff" have been somewhat misleading—you must have access in a continuous form to military judgment.

Mr. VINSON. Well, of course, section 203 does not deny you, but on the contrary permits it, but at the same time it makes a differential. It says "shall not establish a military staff." Now, you would not consider that the Office of Under Secretary would have the authority to establish a military staff?

Secretary FORRESTAL. I consider that any prohibition that applies to me applies to him.

Mr. VINSON. All right.

Mr. RIVERS. Let us report the bill. We know what is in it.

Mr. SHORT. Wait just a minute.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like to offer an amendment before the bill is reported.

Mr. RIVERS. Excuse me.

Mr. SHORT. Are there any questions of you gentlemen back here? (No response.)

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer the following amendment, on page 1, line 9: To insert a colon in lieu of a period, and add this proviso:

Provided, That a person who has within 10 years been on active duty as a commissioned officer in a Regular component of the armed services shall not be eligible for appointment as Under Secretary of Defense.

Now, that is exactly the same provision that is written into the National Security Act insofar as the Secretary of Defense himself is concerned.

Mr. SHORT. I think that should be in. It is very acceptable to me.

Mr. RIVERS. Did you say that is the same wording?

Mr. ELSTON. Exactly the same language.

Mr. SHORT. It conforms to existing law. Without objection, we will accept the amendment.

Mr. RIVERS. I move a favorable report.

Mr. PHILBIN. I have moved the bill be favorably reported.

Mr. SHORT. As amended?

Mr. PHILBIN. As amended.

Mr. RIVERS. And I second the motion.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Clerk, call the roll.

(Roll call.)

Mr. HARPER. Nineteen "ayes," Mr. Chairman.

Digitized by Google

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Short, be instructed to report the bill and file the report, and to make application before the Rules Committee for a rule, and take charge of the bill on the floor of the House.

Mr. PHILBIN. Second the motion.

Mr. SHORT. It has been moved and seconded. All in favor, "aye." Opposed, "no."

It is so ordered.

I think we could get this measure through by unanimous consent.

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Mr. RIVERS. Let us try it.

Mr. SHORT. I think we should try it. There is no use of getting a rule and then have the possibility of debate on this thing. We will try to get it through by unanimous consent, and then if there is any objection we can get a rule.

Mr. VINSON. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. I merely wish to repeat, Mr. Secretary, that most members of the committee are aware, like our very distinguished Chairman Vinson, of the fact that you have been working 18 hours a day, including Sundays, every since you came to Washington, and I am glad this long-overdue legislation will soon become law.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill fixes the pay?

Mr. SHORT. Yes; in the last paragraph——

Mr. VINSON. Let us agree on his pay, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SMART. The point being here that Under Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air draw $10,000, whereas the Under Secretary of State now draws $12,000. It is contemplated in this bill that the Under Secretary of Defense will draw $12,000, the same pay as Under Secretaries in the executive departments, such as the Under Secretary of State, rather than the same pay as Under Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air. It should be clarified.

Mr. VINSON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we put in the bill that he draws $15,000.

Mr. SMART. May I suggest there, Mr. Vinson, that there is pending before the Congress an over-all pay bill affecting such officials.

Mr. VINSON. Twelve thousand, then.

Mr. SMART. Well, this other bill may authorize up to $20,000, but no one knows what the final bill will provide. And it is contemplated by this section that this official, the Under Secretary of Defense, would draw the same pay as is finally approved by the Congress for Under Secretaries of executive departments.

I just wanted to be sure that the committee understood what this section on compensation means.

Mr. COLE. Does Mr. Secretary Forrestal have any comment to make on the point?

Secretary FORRESTAL. Well, I would like to see him, in line with Mr. Vinson's suggestion, draw the $15,000.

I frankly had assumed that the proposals for increasing the pay of executive department officials would cover this situation, but I realize that inasmuch as that is not enacted as yet you probably want to identify the pay that he would get.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I think we are clearly within our rights if we fix the pay ourselves. I think $15,000 is about as small a pay as you could afford to pay.

Digitized by Google

And I might say that I think we are a little derelict in not increasing the pay of the three assistants. You cannot get good Government men for the existing pay, because of the sacrifices that they have to make. This is one of the most responsible positions in the Government. Certainly $15,000 salary is by no means out of line. I think the committee will be clearly justified in putting $15,000 in the bill.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, of course, he ought to be at the same rate as other Secretaries to Cabinet Members.

Mr. SHORT. Because if you do discriminate and there is a different scale, you are going to run into objection on the floor. Someone will object to it.

Mr. KILDAY. And suppose they come out with $20,000, and we have this fixed at $15,000.

Mr. SHORT. Well, I think it is clear enough. We will just leave it as it is.

Now, Mr. Brooks, do you have any report to make from your subcommittee——

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Hébert.

Mr. HÉBERT. Excuse me, Mr. Brooks.

Mr. Chairman, before you leave this bill I understand there was a roll call on it, and I ask permission to be recorded in favor of it.

Mr. SHORT. Without objection, it is so ordered. Record Mr. Hébert.

Mr. Secretary, you are a very busy man. If you care to leave, you may.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I appreciate your courtesy. I wish to thank you and the chairman and members for your very kind consideration.

Mr. SHORT. Thank you.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I was unavoidably detained. I would like to be registered as voting "aye" on the bill creating the Office of Under Secretary of National defense.

Mr. SHORT. Without objection, record the vote of Mr. Anderson as "aye."

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, may I be recorded as voting "aye" on the first bill?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Without objection, Mr. Winstead will be recorded as voting in favor of H. R. 2216.

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BLACKNEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may be recorded as voting favorably on H. R. 2216.

Mr. SHORT. Without objection, the gentleman will be so recorded.

Mr. ARENDS. And me.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Arends, also.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN PERSONNEL AND FORMER PERSONNEL OF THE NAVAL ESTABLISMENT TO ACCEPT CERTAIN GIFTS AND A FOREIGN DECORATION TENDERED BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS (H. R. 2476). MR. VINSON

[THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 14, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to authorize certain personnel and former personnel of the Naval Establishment to accept certain gifts and a foreign decoration tendered by foreign governments.

Digitized by Google

The purpose of the proposed legislation is explained in its title.

The acceptance of gifts from foreign states by persons holding an office of trust profit under the United States is controlled by article I, section 9, clause 8, the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

"No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person olding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of e Congress, accept of any Present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind atever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State."

The Navy Department has interpreted this clause to mean that enlisted men e officers within the purview of this provision and that personnel having any nection with the Navy, including active, inactive, or retired individuals, are so in this category.

At the present time certain gifts and a decoration from foreign nations to rsonnel of the Naval Establishment are being withheld pending appropriate gislation.

The gifts include a barometer, gold watches, pieces of plate, and cigarette cases varded naval personnel at various times since 1935. While the reason for giving ree of these presents is unknown, the others are tokens of appreciation, such as ose items the Danish Government presented to two Naval officers for training anish personnel at the naval air station, Jacksonville, Fla. The Icelandic overnment gave 10 awards for aid to the Icelandic motor vessel Laxfoss, January). 1944, when a Navy invasion boat rescued the passengers and crew of that ssel when she was stranded by night off Reykjavik during a severe snowstorm.

Prince Saud of the Saudi Arabian Government has presented gifts to various ficers and enlisted men of a naval task force recently in Mediterranean waters. hese gifts are in keeping with the precedent created by similar gifts to the navies other countries.

The foreign decoration, the acceptance of which would be authorized by the roposed legislation, is the King's Medal for Service in the Cause of Freedom warded by the British Government to Dr. Mina S. Rees, now head of the Mathematics Branch of the Office of Naval Research, Navy Department, for her contributions in the field of mathematical research during World War II.

The gifts and the decoration are at present in the custody of the State Department pending congressional approval for their acceptance.

The proposed legislation would further authorize the award of the Cross of aval Merit by Peru and two awards of the Order of Naval Merit and Diploma y Brazil.

The enactment of this proposed legislation would result in no cost to the overnment.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of efense to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment nd accordingly recommends its enactment.

An identical report has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of epresentatives this date.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that here is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

Mr. DURHAM. The proposed bill authorizes certain naval personnel nd former naval personnel to accept various gifts and a foreign lecoration heretofore tendered them by foreign governments.

Public Law 314 of the Eightieth Congress amends section 1 of the ct of July 20, 1942, so as to permit a member or former member f the armed forces to accept and wear—uch decorations, orders, medals, and emblems as may be tendered them, and hich are conferred by such governments upon members of their own military orces.

The Department of the Navy does not interpret this law as permitting the acceptance of certain gifts and awards which have been tendered to naval personnel by various foreign governments during the past 15 years. Accordingly, these gifts and awards are now in the custody of the State Department and require congressional approval for their acceptance.

Digitized by Google

Section 1 of this bill, S. 632, names the 38 officers and 30 enlisted men of the Navy or Marine Corps who are involved in the legislation and authorizes their acceptance of the gifts they have been tendered.

Section 2 of the bill authorizes three Navy officers to accept such awards as they have been tendered by foreign governments as of the date of the approval of this act.

Section 3 authorizes a Navy Department civilian employee to accept a medal tendered her by Great Britain. This happens to be a woman.

The bill has the recommendation of the Navy Department, the approval of the Secretary of Defense, and the Bureau of the Budget interposes no objection.

The committee report on this bill is unanimous, and the subcommittee asks that it be reported to the full house.

Mr. VINSON. It is a Senate bill, is it not?

Mr. SHORT. S. 632.

Mr. VINSON. I move the bill be favorably reported and that the gentleman from North Carolina report the bill, Mr. Durham.

Mr. BROOKS. May I ask a question with reference to this?

Mr. Chairman, are there any men who have been tendered medals that are not included in this?

Mr. DURHAM. That will require special legislation by the committee on each item.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, what is the nature of the gifts referred to?

Mr. DURHAM. There is a long list of those, if you care to read it. They are watches, cigarette cases, and similar things.

Mr. PHILBIN. Given by the governments or by private individuals?

Mr. DURHAM. By various governments.

Now, the State Department, of course, accepts those and can accept them, and it makes it rather hard on the service personnel not to be able to accept them. It is rather embarrassing to the foreign governments. They are just held in escrow at the State Department until action by the Congress is taken.

Mr. SHORT. It has been moved and seconded that the bill be reported favorably.

All in favor say "aye." Opposed, "no."

It is so ordered. Mr. Durham will report the bill.

What else, Mr. Durham?

Mr. DURHAM. The committee also reports S. 279 and recommends approval of this bill.

[No. 7]

TO AUTHORIZE THE ADVANCE ON THE RETIRED LIST OF LT. JOHN T. MCDERMOTT, UNITED STATES NAVY (RETIRED), TO THE GRADE OF LIEUTENANT COMMANDER (H. R. 1793). MR. COLE OF NEW YORK

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to authorize the advance on the retired list of Lt. John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), to the grade of lieutenant commander.

Lieutenant McDermott entered the Naval Academy as a midshipman on May 31, 1916, and was commissioned as an ensign on June 7, 1919. He served on the active list of the Navy successively in the grades of ensign, lieutenant (junior grade), and lieutenant until June 30, 1941, on which date he was transferred to the retired list pursuant to section 12 (k) of the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 950), as amended by the act of October 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 1174, 1175), by reason of having twice failed of selection as lieutenant commander. On that same date he was advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander with retired pay of that grade in accordance with the second proviso of the said section 13 (j), as interpreted by the Navy Department, which provides:

"That lieutenants who served in the Navy or Naval Reserve Force prior to November 12, 1918, and who shall have completed not less than twenty-one years of service, and who subsequent to June 23, 1938, have been or shall hereafter be retired under any provision of law, shall be advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander on the retired list, effective from date of retirement with the retired pay of that grade."

The Assistant Comptroller General, however, has held (B–61756, dated January 8, 1947) that a lieutenant of the Navy whose only service prior to November 12, 1918, was that of a midshipman at the Naval Academy may not be regarded as having served in the Navy or Naval Reserve Force prior to November 12, 1918, within the meaning of the said section 12 (k). Although the said section 12 (k) was specifically repealed by section 436 (g) of the act of August 7, 1947 (Public Law 381, 80th Cong.), such repeal is not pertinent in view of said Assistant Comptroller General's decision that section 12 (k) does not apply to Lieutenant McDermott.

As a result of the Assistant Comptroller General's decision that Lieutenant McDermott's advancement to the grade of lieutenant commander was erroneous and that his status on the retired list is that of a lieutenant, this officer now finds himself indebted to the Government in the amount of approximately $2,300. The Navy Department considers that checkage of the retired pay of this officer to satisfy such an indebtedness would be unjust.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to legalize the action of the Navy Department in advancing Lieutenant McDermott to the grade of lieutenant commander and remove the necessity for checkage of his retired pay.

The Navy Department, accordingly, recommends enactment of the proposed legislation.

It is estimated that enactment of the proposed legislation will result in a cost of approximately $2,300 to the Government.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Enclosure.

A BILL To authorize the advance on the retired list of Lieutenant John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), to the grade of lieutenant commander

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, Lieutenant John T. McDermott, United States Navy (retired), shall be advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander on the retired list effective for all purposes from the date of his retirement.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. This is in regard to Lieutenant John T. McDermott, USN, retired in 1941 after some 22 years of service, exclusive of Naval Academy time. He was retired, however, as a lieutenant commander pursuant to the act of June 23, 1938, which provided that lieutenants who served in the Navy or Naval Reserve prior to November 12, 1918, and had completed 21 years of service were to be retired with the rank and pay of a lieutenant commander.

On January 8, 1947, however, the Office of Comptroller General ruled that Lieutenant McDermott's Naval Academy service did not count as service in the Navy or Naval Reserve, therefore he had improperly retired as a lieutenant commander.

The officer is now under the requirement of refunding approximately $2,300 which has been paid to him, and he has been reduced to the grade of lieutenant on the retired list.

The Navy Department considers it unjust to require this officer to refund the $2,300 and seeks in the proposed legislation to validate the payment and confirm his retirement in the grade of lieutenant commander.

The bill has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, and the subcommittee is unanimous in its report and asks for a favorable report by the full committee to the House.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be favorably reported.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the Navy Department?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. It is my understanding that they are giving this officer credit for the time at the Naval Academy; is that correct?

Captain McDILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will this in any way establish a precedent?

Captain McDILL. It will not in this case. This case will not establish a precedent or general counting of service.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. It will not.

Captain McDILL. This bill is for the purpose of relieving a checkage against this officer by reason of a misunderstanding as to the meaning of "naval service prior to November 12, 1918."

Mr. VAN ZANDT. As I understand it, the man has already received the $2,300?

Captain McDILL. He has, sir.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And the Navy Department is simply asking Congress for approval of that payment that has already been made?

Captain McDILL. That is true, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. The Senate has passed S. 279, and the subcommittee's report is unanimous.

Mr. SHORT. Without objection, the bill is reported. Mr. Durham will report S. 279.

Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. Subcommittee No. 3 has reported unanimously S. 630 and recommends a favorable report.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Navy recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To amend section 19 of the act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), so as to remove the upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy."

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to amend section19 of the act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), so as to remove the upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to remove the present 25-year upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy.

Under present circumstances the existing maximum age limit has become unduly restrictive. Many of the recent college graduates and those who will graduate within the next several years are veterans. Their ages are well above the prewar average and in many cases they are, therefore, ineligible for appointment in the Supply Corps under existing law. The 25-year age restriction also prevents the appointment of some Naval Academy graduates who, upon graduation, may not be physically qualified as line officers.

A further reason for amending the present section 19 arises out of its inconsistency with other statutory provisions. While the act of August 13, 1946, pertains to the procurement of officers from civilian sources, and section 19 would be construed as a restriction on that source only, section 6 of the act of July 22, 1935 (49 Stat. 487), and section 404 of the act of August 7, 1947 (61 Stat. 795), which pertain to appointments from personnel already in the Navy, contain no similar limitation. The 1935 act, authorizing transfers of line officers to the various staff corps, expressly provides that such transfers may be made regardless of age. The 1947 act, in its provisions for limited-duty officers to be appointed from warrant and enlisted grades, requires a minimum of 10 years' service in the Navy but sets no limitation as to age. While these two acts do not conflict with section 19 of the act of August 13, 1946, the latter is inconsistent with them for it results in different age requirements for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps depending upon the source of the appointment.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment and accordingly recommends its enactment.

This report has been coordinated within the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Department of the Navy has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. DURHAM. This proposed bill will remove the present maximum age limit of assistant paymasters of 25 for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy. This limit applies to appointment of assistant paymasters only and has had the result of barring the Navy from considering for appointment many veterans who are graduating from college above the age of 25. The limit has also not permitted in some instances the appointment of Naval Academy graduates as assistant paymasters when such graduates have not been physically qualified for line-officer appointment.

The enactment of the proposed legislation will not result in any increased costs to the Government. Its passage is recommended by the Navy Department and the National Military Establishment, and the Bureau of the Budget interposes no objection.

I move a favorable report on the bill.

Mr. SHORT. All in favor say "Aye." Opposed, "No."

The bill is reported favorably.

RELATING TO THE PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL RESERVE PERFORMING ACTIVE DUTY IN THE GRADE OF REAR ADMIRAL (H. R. 2426). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 19, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill relating to the pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve performing active duty in the grade of rear admiral, and for other purposes.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to remove an inadvertent discrimination now existing between rear admirals of the Naval Reserve and rear admirals of the Regular Navy in the matter of upper-half pay and allowances.

Digitized by Google

Under section 7 of the Naval Personnel Act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1005), rear admirals on the active list of the line of the Navy were divided for pay purposes into the upper half and the lower half; those officers embraced in the lower half of the grade numerically were given the pay and allowances authorized for brigadier generals of the Army; and those of the upper half, the pay and allowances of a major general of the Army. That division of rear admirals on the active list was continued in effect by subsequent acts including section 7 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, as amended (37 U. S. C. 107), which section uses in part the following language:

"SEC. 7. The annual base pay of a brigadier general * * * or * * * rear admiral (lower half) of the Navy * * * shall be $6,600; and the annual base pay of a major general * * * or * * * rear admiral (upper half) of the Navy * * * shall be $8,800 * * *." [Italics supplied.]

Section 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, as amended, provides in part as follows:

"SEC. 14. Officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Reserve forces of any of the services mentioned in the title of this Act, when on active duty in the service of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the same pay and allowances as are authorized for persons of corresponding grade and length of service in the Regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or Public Health Service."

Section 2 of the act of June 30, 1942 (56 Stat. 464, 50 U. S. C. 807), dealt with the advancement of rear admirals to the upper half of that grade and provided in part as follows:

"SEC. 2. The number of rear admirals on the active list of the line entitled to the pay and allowances provided by law for rear admirals of the upper half, exclusive of those carried as additional numbers in such grade, shall be one-half of the number of permanent and temporary officers of the line in that grade * * *."

At the request of the Navy Department, the Comptroller General of the United States considered the question of upper-half pay for rear admirals of the Naval Reserve. His decision of September 10, 1946 (B-57583), held that section 2 of the above-mentioned act of June 30, 1942, referred to rear admirals on the active list of the line of the Navy and that the term "active list," with reference to the Navy, generally was used to denote officers of the Regular Navy as distinguished from officers of the Naval Reserve and officers on the retired list. It was further held, that while an officer of the Naval Reserve appointed to the grade or rank of rear admiral is entitled, when on active duty, to the same pay and allowances authorized for officers of corresponding grade and length of service in the Regular Navy (pursuant to sec. 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942), the matter of determining whether such officer is entitled to receive the pay of the upper half is dependent, not upon his length of service, but rather upon his numerical standing on the list of rear admirals of the line on the active list. The Comptroller determined that Reserve officers promoted to the grade of rear admiral do not thereby become entitled to have their names placed on the list of rear admirals of the line on the active list; hence, such officers are not entitled to receive the pay and allowances of the upper half as such pay is specifically authorized only for officers on the active list of the line of the Navy. The Comptroller General concluded that in the absence of a statute specifically so providing, his office—

"would not be justified in viewing the provision in section 14 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, supra, as authorizing credit of active upper half pay to officers promoted * * * to the rank of rear admiral in the Naval Reserve."

The proposed bill is designed to remove the unjust discrimination against Reserve rear admirals whose names are not on either of the lineal lists established under title III of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947. Reserve rear admirals whose names are placed on a lineal list will be entitled to receive upper-half pay, when appropriate, pursuant to the provisions of the Officer Personnel Act (secs. 311 (d) (14) and 315). The proposed legislation is not retroactive.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this measure on behalf of the National Military Establishment, and accordingly recommends its enactment.

This report has been coordinated within the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. DURHAM. This proposed bill is prompted by the fact that although existing law permits Naval Reserve officers to retain the grade of rear admiral, the Comptroller General has ruled that such officers may not receive pay of the upper half under any condition, for the reason that no statutory provision affirmatively provides for it. A Regular Navy rear admiral of the upper half receives the pay of an Army major general while one of the lower half receives the pay of a brigadier general.

The proposed bill applies only to Reserve rear admirals on active duty in connection with the organization and administration of the Reserve program. Since there is now one rear admiral on active duty in that status with the precedence of Regular Navy rear admirals entitled to upper-half pay, this bill will authorize the officer concerned, as well as any others who in the future may be assigned to similar active duty, to receive pay equal to that of other rear admirals with whom they have precedence.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, if this has the approval of the Navy Department, since it is such an unusual thing—that they would go to such a great deal of trouble for the Reserve—I think we ought to pass it unanimously.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee amendment to the proposed bill—on line 4, page 1, after the word "shall" add a comma and insert "when otherwise entitled to active-duty pay and allowances"—will insure that such pay and allowances may be received by a Reserve rear admiral only when otherwise entitled to active-duty pay and allowances.

This bill just simply places the Reserve rear admiral on the same pay basis as a Regular rear admiral.

The subcommittee recommends its passage, as amended.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I may say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia, who is here, that the Navy Department has looked after the Reserves in grand style.

Mr. SHORT. Do I hear a motion?

Mr. VINSON. I move the bill as amended be favorably reported.

Mr. SHORT. Any seconds?

Mr. RIVERS. I second the motion.

Mr. SHORT. All in favor say "aye." Opposed, "no."

The bill as amended is favorably reported.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, Subcommittee No. 3 has finished a hearing and reports H. R. 2546, the so-called radar screen measure——

Mr. SHORT. This is a very important bill.

Mr. DURHAM. And recommends a favorable report and adoption by the committee.

(H. R. 2546 is as follows:)

[H. R. 2546, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations for the national security, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby authorized to establish and develop within and without the continental limits of the United States in fulfilling the air defense responsibilities of the Department of the Air Force such land-based air warning and control installations and facilities, by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, utilities, and access roads, and to provide for necessary administration and planning therefor, without regard o sections 1136, 3648, 3734, Revised Statutes, as he may deem necessary in the nterest of national security.

SEC. 2. In furtherance of the above, the Secretary of the Air Force is authorized o make surveys and to acquire lands and rights pertaining thereto or other nterests therein, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, xchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, and to place permanent and emporary improvements thereon whether such lands are held in fee or under ease, or under other temporary tenure.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in he Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may e necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, and when so specified in an ppropriation Act such amounts shall remain available until expended.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire when the hearings became vailable?

Mr. DURHAM. I beg your pardon?

Mr. COLE. When were the hearings available?

Mr. DURHAM. Well——

Mr. VINSON. They have not come out yet, have they?

Mr. HARPER. No.

Mr. COLE. This is such an important bill that I would like to have he hearings.

Mr. VINSON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we let this go over to ext Tuesday.

Mr. SHORT. What is the estimated cost?

Mr. DURHAM. $161,000,000.

Mr. SHORT. We better have hearings on that.

Mr. VINSON. We did.

Mr. SHORT. I mean get copies of the hearings.

Mr. VINSON. May I ask the clerk—the hearings were sent down when?

Mr. HARPER. On this particular bill, they were sent down last night. They will be back in a couple of days.

Mr. VINSON. On the radar bill?

Mr. SMART. That is right; yes, sir.

Mr. HARPER. The hearings were only concluded Saturday, and hey were sent down last night.

Mr. Vinson. Of course we can't take that bill up. We will take it p next Tuesday.

Mr. Rivers. In that connection, a lot of people may be out of own next Tuesday.

Mr. VINSON. Well, then——

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I might say there was a lot in these hearings that couldn't be taken down. There was no record made of it. There might be some things, of course, that the committee would desire to go into executive session on. It would have to, necessarily. We have a full explanation of the bill here, about as full as the hearing can give you.

Mr. SHORT. Is that right?

Mr. SMART. Yes, sir.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest we follow the rules and just let this matter go over until next week sometime. We are going to have a full committee meeting next week. We can take that up after the hearings have all been printed.

Mr. SHORT. It is too important to dispose of quickly.

You are through, Mr. Durham?

Mr. DURHAM. I am through.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Brooks.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, this H. R. 1741 is in a similar situation, in that hearings are not available.

However, Mr. Chairman, outside of prepared statements of five witnesses there are no hearings on it. The hearings were not recorded. They were all in executive session. They were all top military secrets.

Mr. SHORT. What is the bill?

Mr. BROOKS. I think I can explain the bill just about as well as you could understand it from the meager hearings. It has for a single purpose the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles.

Now, the services have three proving grounds for guided missiles. None of these three proving grounds, however, are capable of expansion to handle guided missiles with ranges over 100 miles.

Mr. SHORT. Where are they?

Mr. BROOKS. One is in New Mexico and one is southern California

Mr. SHORT. And Washington.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes. There are three of them in all. As I say, none of them are susceptible of expansion. The services feel the need of testing missiles up to 500 miles, and perhaps, after a period of years at 3,000 miles. Therefore, it is vital to them that they obtain a joint proving ground to be sponsored by all services but to be constructed initially by the Air Force. They come to us with this bill providing for a $200,000,000 authorization for that purpose.

The committee considered the bill very carefully. And especially they considered the question of how the money was going to be spent and—in detail—how much for housing, how much for installation and how much for equipment. And we got a break-down on it.

After carefully considering that, the committee decided to reduce the amount from $200,000,000, as authorized in section 3 of the bill to $75,000,000. That amount the services said would be ample for the initial construction of the proving ground.

Mr. ARENDS. Why did they ask for $200,000,000, then?

Mr. BROOKS. Because over a long period of time they will need $200,000,000.

Mr. RIVERS. At least.

Mr. BROOKS. But they are not prepared to give now the detail of their long-range plans. Guided missiles, as you know, are in an experimental condition. The experiments during the initial phase may show, for instance, that the plans that they now have in mind for future expansion are not in the right direction and therefore the future plans would be changed. They are not able to give us detailed information over a period of years.

The committee thought it wise to reduce the amount to $75,000,000 which will let them do their job. And that was acceptable to the services.

Mr. ARENDS. Is the $75,000,000 in the budget? I mean, will they get the funds out of the budget?

Mr. BROOKS. This bill is approved by the budget.

Mr. SHORT. It is just an authorization. They will have to come back each year for appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. How did they break this down? How much for land and how much for construction, just in a general way?

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROOKS. They gave us a general estimate on that. Housing, y figured would run about $20,000 a unit there. They think they need, on the base itself, about 800 or 900 enlisted personnel, and ether with the dependents they thought that would run around 00. In addition to that, they thought they would need in all about 00 personnel, as I recall.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I had in mind: Is half of it for land and half the other expenditures, or how is it divided up?

Mr. BROOKS. Not in percentages. We checked what they thought y would pay for the land, that is, frontage.

If the committee wants to go into executive session, we can give the actual break-down, but it is difficult to do so without going o confidential information which they are not ready to release at s time.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, may I make this statement, or comnt. This bill is a very important bill, and so is the bill for the lar screen. But both bills involve such large sums of money that hink in fairness to all members of the committee it might be well us to follow the rule which specifies that we have to have the nted hearings for 3 days before we can vote.

I was under the impression that the hearings went on to the printer other day. It takes a good deal of time to get the printers to these back here. So I suggest that we put the consideration of se bills off until we do get the hearings, because a good deal of e testimony was in executive session, and we will probably want to into executive session to have them considered.

Mr. SHORT. Yes; I think so. I know I would like to sit in.

Mr. VINSON. So I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Brooks wait til next week.

Now, has that one gone to the printer?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. VINSON. When is it going to the printer?

Mr. BROWN. Today.

Mr. VINSON. Everything?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. It came back from the Air Force this rning.

Mr. VINSON. All right.

Mr. SHORT. Anything else, Mr. Brooks?

Mr. BROOKS. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. I think it was our clear understanding—off the record re.

(Statement by Mr. Short outside the record.)

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask by unanimous consent that e committee go on record as expressing its thanks and appreciation the Military Establishment in connection with its air demonstration sterday at Andrews Field.

Mr. SHORT. Yes; without objection an appropriate message of anks will be transmitted by the committee.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, if Subcommittee No. 1 has not any re bills for the full committee, I propose to ask consideration of a l to permit the Marine Band to go to the last meeting of the Grand my of the Republic.

Mr. COLE. How do you know it is the last?

Mr. VINSON. Well, there are only six living.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HARPER. They adopted a resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, is that the GAR bill?

Mr. HARPER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. For the encampment at Indianapolis?

Mr. HARPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I ask favorable action on this bill, as that is a bill that I am very much interested in. That is the last meeting of the GAR——

Mr. SHORT. If you want it, we are for it. Without objection, we will report it favorably.

Mr. VINSON. Do you want to read the bill?

Mr. HARPER. Yes, sir. [Reading:]

[H. R. 2485, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To authorize the attendance of the United States Marine Band at the Eighty-third and Final National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to be held in Indianapolis, Indiana, August 28 to September 1, 1949

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized to permit the band of the United States Marine Corps to attend and give concerts at the Eighty-third and Final National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to be held in Indianapolis, Indiana, August 28 to September 1, 1949.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of such band in attending and giving concerts at such convention, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated a sufficient sum to cover the cost of transportation and pullman accommodations for the leaders and members of the Marine Band, and allowance not to exceed $8 per day each for additional traveling and living expenses while on duty, such allowance to be in addition to the pay and allowances to which they would be entitled while serving their permanent station.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move the gentleman from Indiana be instructed to report the bill favorably to the House.

Mr. WALSH. Thank you.

Mr. SHORT. It has been moved and seconded that the bill be favorably reported by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Walsh.

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Wait just a minute.

All in favor say "aye." Opposed, "No."

Report it.

Mr. WALSH. Thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statement.

I set down for Monday, the 21st, a full committee hearing at which time I will ask Mr. Kilday to preside and take charge, for the purpose of opening a hearing before the full committee on the pay bill. The pay bill has been referred to Subcommittee No. 2, but a portion of it I think should be heard by the full committee.

So I am asking the committee recess until Monday morning at 10 o'clock, at which time Mr. Forrestal and the representatives of the Hook Commission will make a general statement. And after the general statements before the full committee are finished, why, then, Mr. Kilday and his subcommittee will take charge of the pay bill and consider it.

And on March 2 Mr. Brooks will start a hearing on the military justice bill. The opening statement on that bill, and certain information which will be of interest to the full committee will be given, and Mr. Brooks will preside.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Chairman, I move——

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, before that, as to this meeting on onday, I hope that most of the committee can be here. This ook Commission is a civilian commission who worked for over a ar on this problem, at great expense to themselves, and they are ning here from different parts of the country for the purpose of ing us the over-all picture on pay adjustments. There will be ee of them here. The fourth one, Father Cavanaugh, the president Notre Dame, will not be able to be here at that time, but it is pro-sed that he come at a later date. I think we owe it to these men to here, and I think we need to know something about what is moti-ting the desire for pay adjustments. It is a very complicated bill d consists of 126 pages of printed matter. The hearings will obably run on for a number of weeks, to get the technical details. hink it is highly important that the committee be given the view-int of this commission, which is going to be here for that purpose ly.

Mr. ARENDS. I thought we settled that last year.

Mr. KILDAY. No; that was the promotion bill.

Mr. VINSON. I am going to ask, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Kilday d Mr. Brooks try to finish their hearings and be able to report to e full committee on those two bills sometime at least by the 1st day April. That will give them the full month of March to fix up those o bills.

Mr. Chairman, if there is no other business——

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. In view of the question on the radar bill, I am going have mailed to each member an explanation of the bill in detail, d if you will read it I think you will get more information out of it an you will out of the hearing.

Mr. SHORT. Good.

We stand recessed until next Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 11:15 a. m., the committee adjourned.)

[No. 6]

TO PREVENT RETROACTIVE CHECKAGE OF PAYMENTS ERRONEOUSLY MADE TO CERTAIN RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL RESERVE AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 1761). Mr. KILDAY

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, January 3, 1949.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to prevent retroative checkage of payments erroneously made to certain retired officers of the Naval Reserve, and for other purposes.

The proposed legislation has a dual purpose. The primary purpose is to prevent checkage of payments made to certain officers of the Naval Reserve supposedly as retirement pay. The secondary purpose is to permit officers of the Naval Reserve, heretofore or hereafter placed on the honorary retired list, to avail themselves of the retirement benefits of sections 6 and 7 of the act approved February 21, 1946 (60 Stat. 27; 34 U. S. C. 410 (b) and 410 (c)), if they meet the service requirements specified therein.

The officers who would be affected by the primary purpose of the proposed bill were placed on or transferred to the honorary retired list of the Naval Reserve, without pay, prior to World War II under the provisions of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, as amended (34 U. S. C. 855h). They subsequently served on active duty through the war, thereby acquiring sufficient active-duty credit to complete more than 20 years of active service. Accordingly, the retirement status of each was modified pursuant to section 6 of the act of February 21, 1946, and payments made as retirement pay pursuant to section 7 of said act. Said sections 6 and 7 read in part as follows:

"SEC. 6. When any officer of the Regular Navy or * * * the Reserve components thereof has completed more than twenty years of active service * * * at least ten years of which shall have been active commissioned service he may at any time thereafter * * * be placed upon the retired list on the first day of such month as the President may designate.

"SEC. 7. (a) Each officer retired pursuant to the foregoing sections * * * shall be placed on the retired list with the highest rank * * * held by him while on active duty * * *. Officers retired pursuant to the foregoing sections * * * shall receive retired pay at the rate of 2½ per centum of the active-duty pay with longevity credit of the rank with which retired, multiplied by the number of years of service for which entitled to credit in the computation of their pay while on active duty, not to exceed a total of 75 per centum of said active-duty pay * * *."

It was considered at the time, that although they had been previously placed on the honorary retired list, this fact would not be a legal obstacle to their "reretirement" with pay under the aforementioned act of February 21, 1946; hence, upon their own applications, they were placed on the retired list with pay.

In a decision dated May 6, 1947 (B–63359), the Comptroller General of the United States held that the action taken in the cases of these officers was not permitted by law; that they were not considered as being included within the provisions of section 6; and that they were not entitled to retirement, with pay, thereunder. These officers are, therefore, subject to checkage for all amounts they received supposedly as retirement pay.

The General Accounting Office has agreed to withhold checkage action pending initiation by the Navy Department of remedial legislation. The number of officers so involved is very small (three living and one deceased), but it is felt that since the reretirement of these officers was attempted in good faith and they accepted payments believed to be legal, such action should be validated. The total amount of checkage involved in the case of the above-mentioned four officers is $15,778.47. It is believed that the number of officers who will benefit from the secondary purpose of the proposed legislation will be very small.

The Navy Department recommends enactment of the proposed legislation.

An identical report has been transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives this date.

The Departments of the Army and Air Force have no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

Digitized by Google

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KILDAY. Are you going to appear on the bill, Commander Martineau?

Commander MARTINEAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. All right, Commander.

Commander MARTINEAU. Mr. Chairman, I have a very brief statement here which I would like to read, and then I am sure you will have questions following that. If I may proceed, I will read a brief statement.

Mr. KILDAY. Go right ahead, sir.

Commander MARTINEAU. The purpose of this bill is to give officers of the Naval Reserve who have been placed on the honorary retired list the benefits of sections 6 and 7 of Public Law 305, approved February 21, 1946, if they meet the service requirements specified therein. These requirements are that the officer shall have performed at least 20 years' active service in the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, or the Reserve components thereof, including active duty for training, at least 10 years of which shall have been active commissioned service.

Four officers of the honorary retired list—one of whom has since died—were reretired under section 6 of Public Law 305 and were paid retired pay at the higher rate. As a result of a decision of the Comptroller General of May 6, 1947 (B-63359), the payments of retired pay to these officers under Public Law 305 were checked, but the checkages were held in abeyance pending consideration of this legislation.

One additional officer who was reretired under section 6 of Public Law 305 was not paid in view of the Comptroller's decision.

In addition to the foregoing, four officers on the honorary retired list who were placed thereon under section 309 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, and entitled to retired pay under section 310 of the Naval Reserve Act, would be entitled to a recomputation of their retired pay based upon sections 6 and 7 of Public Law 305.

This situation, Mr. Chairman, affects mostly four officers. These four officers were retired under the provisions of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, which permitted Reserve officers who had performed certain periods of Reserve duty—not active service, necessarily—to be placed upon the honorary retired list without pay, and they were so retired. World War II came along and those officers returned to active duty, and at the end of World War II were demobilized along with everybody else.

Concurrently, the Congress enacted Public Law 305. Public Law 305 stated in effect that any officer of the Regular Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, or of the Reserve components thereof, who performed not less than 20 years of active service —at least 10 years of those had to be active commissioned service—could be retired upon their own application and receive retired pay at the rate of 2½ percent of their base and longevity pay times the number of years' service.

Digitized by Google

So, as you see, those four officers then became eligible under Public Law 305.

The Navy Department, therefore, to give them the advantages of Public Law 305, which they had justly earned, reretired them under Public Law 305. It was all in due order.

Then they commenced receiving retired pay under Public Law 305. About a year later, the Comptroller General, in reviewing that act, determined that those officers could not be reretired; that they had once been retired and been placed on the honorary retired list, even though it was without pay—and, therefore, the reretirement was not proper—and directed that those officers repay to the Government the retired pay that they had received.

That is the situation, primarily, that this bill seeks to correct, and will correct.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, on the honorary list, they draw no retired pay; is that right?

Commander MARTINEAU. The four officers that I am speaking of did not draw any pay.

Now, there is another situation that I should bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that this bill also will correct. Under the same Naval Reserve Act of 1938, which provided an honorary retired list——

Mr. COLE. Will you explain what is meant by an honorary retired list, and how an officer gets there?

If you do not mind, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. KILDAY. Go right ahead.

Commander MARTINEAU. Yes, sir; I will.

The Naval Reserve Act of 1938 established what was known and what is known today as the honorary retired list. It was intended to be a retired list for officers who had been in the Reserve, who may or may not have spent time on active duty, but they had a number of years' service in the Reserve components. For instance, the law provided that any Reserve officer who reached the age of 64 would be eligible to be placed upon the honorary retired list.

Mr. COLE. Irrespective of the length of his service as a Reserve?

Commander MARTINEAU. Irrespective of the length of his service. It said that any officer who had spent not less than 20 years in the Reserve—not necessarily active service—could be placed upon the honorary retired list without pay. Any officer of the Naval Reserve who incurred a physical disability that would not entitle him to the regular retirement, but who could not perform his duties in the Reserve, could be placed upon the honorary retired list or discharged in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. COLE. Does that apply to that individual irrespective of his length of service?

Commander MARTINEAU. It did, provided that in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy that officer had made a contribution to the Reserve, and that in the Secretary's opinion he would bring credit to the uniform, and so forth, by giving him a continued naval status.

Now, there was one other means whereby an officer could be placed on the honorary retired list without pay, and that was if he attained certain maximum ages and had not been promoted beyond a certain grade. For instance, an officer who became 40 years of age and was still an ensign, or a lieutenant, junior grade, could be placed by the

Digitized by Google

Secretary of the Navy on the honorary retired list for what you might call service in grade.

Mr. JOHNSON. Could I ask a question right there?

Commander MARTINEAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. 305 is the statute that places him on the retirement list in the highest grade that he held.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct. That came later, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; I understand that. I just wanted to identify the statute, that is all.

Commander MARTINEAU. This was in 1938, as you will see. The situation I have been describing covers entirely retirements on the honorary list without pay.

Now, the 1938 act had also a provision in it whereby a Reserve officer could be placed on the honorary list with pay. It provided that a Reserve officer or an enlisted man who had put in 30 years on active service could be placed upon the honorary retired list with 50 percent of his base pay and longevity—just a flat 50 percent, regardless of the length of service—and an officer or enlisted man of the Reserve could be placed upon the honorary retired list with pay if he had spent 20 years on active duty, providing that 10 of the past 11 years had been spent on active duty, with 50 percent pay.

So, we now have five other officers who were retired and placed on the honorary retired list with pay under the 1938 act of the flat 50 percent. It was 50 percent, or nothing—no more and no less. And they have been drawing that pay.

Now, they, too, returned to active duty and served in World War II and had considerable amounts of active duty, 20 years, 25 years, and in some cases 30 years were earned for pay. They are still limited to 50 percent under the 1938 act, although they have earned higher retirement pay under Public Law 305 that you just mentioned, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. KILDAY. Not only more pay but a higher grade.

Commander MARTINEAU. But a higher grade.

Mr. KILDAY. When he retired after the Second World War because of 305, he retired in the highest grade satisfactorily held during the war.

Commander MARTINEAU. During World War II.

Mr. KILDAY. So, there are two things involved.

Commander MARTINEAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. The increased pay because of the additional length in his second retirement, and the increase over the flat 50 percent.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir.

Now, of the officers in the group I just named—those who were on the honorary retired list with pay—there is only one who was promoted during World War II. You understand they were all quite elderly men and they had fairly high rank. They were assigned largely to administrative jobs because of their age and physical condition, and so forth. Only one officer, a Captain Laighton, was promoted to the temporary grade of captain during World War II. So far as benefiting by the highest rank under Public Law 305, they had no higher rank than what they had previously held, except for Captain Laighton.

Digitized by Google

Mr. PRICE. What if they had held higher rank? How about the case of one that does hold higher rank, will this retire him at the higher rank?

Commander MARTINEAU. It will not be any higher, sir, than the rank for which he had been receiving pay on the honorary retired list.

Mr. PRICE. Technically, these men should not have been reretired, should they? They should have reverted to the retired list. They have a ruling on that in the Army, I know, because I am familiar with at least one case in the Army.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is what the Comptroller General held, sir. The Navy Department at the time, since these men had qualified for a higher pay under the new law (Public Law 305), retired them under Public Law 305, or reretired them; and the Comptroller General said just what you remarked; that you could not do that.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the estimated financial obligation we will assume if we pass this bill?

Commander MARTINEAU. For the officers whose pay has been withheld, that money has really all been appropriated for. We just had to hold it because of the ruling by the Comptroller. That would be an estimated $56,000 initially, and then an estimated $19,000 thereafter.

Mr. KILDAY. Annually?

Commander MARTINEAU. Annually; yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. Let me get one thing clear in my mind. In other words, these officers involved first retired under the then existing law. Then another law was passed. I have forgotten the number that you referred to. So, after having retired under the then existing law, they then reretired them under a new law which was passed which gave them greater benefits; is that correct?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir, although at the time they were originally retired, of course, the new law did not exist.

Mr. HÉBERT. I understand. In other words, they were retired under a then existing law, and then subsequently another law was passed. So you then reretired them in order to give them the added benefits of the new law?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, is this what happened: You retired them first under one law and then, when the new law came and they qualified, you retired them under that later act?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct.

Mr. ELSTON. That was because they reentered the service.

Commander MARTINEAU. They had reentered the service and had performed active service throughout World War II.

Mr. ELSTON. So they would not be getting any more if they had never been placed on the honorary retired list in the first place?

Commander MARTINEAU. If they had not come back to active duty in World War II, they would not have qualified under the new law.

Mr. HÉBERT. Excuse me.

Mr. ELSTON. Sure.

Mr. HÉBERT In other words, they were retired before the outbreak of World War II?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct.

Mr. HÉBERT. Then they returned to active duty in World War II.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HÉBERT. Then, after having served on active duty in World War II, they became eligible under the new law, and you retired them under the new law. However, between the first retirement and the second retirement, there was a period of active duty?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is exactly right, sir.

Mr. COLE. Were they back on duty before this second law was passed?

Commander MARTINEAU. Oh, yes, long before. The second law (Public Law 305) that I referred to was passed February 21, 1946.

Mr. KILDAY. They had drawn this retired pay over what period of time?

Commander MARTINEAU. They had drawn this retired pay for a period of approximately 1 year, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And now the Comptroller General is demanding they refund that money?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Except as to one officer who never did get started?

Commander MARTINEAU. He never did get started.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you consider, if we did not take this step, that that was discrimination against the little group there that came in?

Commander MARTINEAU. Very definitely.

Mr. JOHNSON. You want to put them on a parity with the rest of them?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is right, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. In other words, they vacated their retirement service when they returned to active duty; is that correct?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir. In other words, when the war started, as the committee well knows, the Navy recalled to active duty every person on the retired list—whether it was with or without pay—if he was almost able to work.

Mr. HÉBERT. And you merely want to put these officers, as suggested by Mr. Johnson, on the same status as everybody else that served actively?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is right.

Mr. COLE. Were there only nine officers on the Navy retired list who went back to active duty?

Commander MARTINEAU. No, far more than that. Only nine got caught in this particular situation.

Mr. COLE. Why is that? Why would not they all get caught, the same as these nine?

Commander MARTINEAU. It is just the honorary retired list, sir. You see, there were officers who were placed on the honorary retired list before World War II who also came back to active duty in World War II, but by the time they finished their World War II service they still did not have enough service to qualify under Public Law 305. These people were close to having 20 years of active service when they were retired in 1938; and, having served in World War II, that put them over the hump, so to speak, and they had 20 or more years of active service.

Mr. KILDAY. Why would not a man who retired, say, in 1938 have been entitled to full retirement?

Commander MARTINEAU. Well, sir——

Mr. KILDAY. He would have been a veteran of the First World War.

Digitized by Google

Commander MARTINEAU. Well, the honorary retired list applies only to the Naval Reserve. And the qualifications for it were not minimum periods of active service. They were simply minimum periods of inactive service, or service while as members of the Naval Reserve. And retirement, certainly up to and including a good part of World War II, was restricted entirely to a qualification of active Federal service; and, as a rule, it was only the Regular who met those qualifications of active Federal service.

Mr. KILDAY. So, this 20 years was not necessarily active Federal service. It was their total service?

Commander MARTINEAU. For their original retirement, you mean?

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

Commander MARTINEAU. For the original retirement, that is correct. But, for the reretirement under Public Law 305, that was 20 or more years of active service.

Mr. BLANDFORD. This just applies, Mr. Chairman, to that handful of officers who before the war had accumulated a rather substantial number of years of active duty. It was very unusual, for example, before 1938 to have a Reserve in the Navy—even on active duty—for periods in excess of 2 weeks or a month or a year. Some of these people had accumulated 12 or 13 years of active duty, but they had also been in the Reserves for 20 years; and because they were in the Reserves for 20 years they qualified to go on the honorary retired list, which is just an honor, without pay. Then they came back, because they were recalled to active duty, and served a sufficient length of time so that, when the act was passed in 1946 which gave retirement for 20 years of active service, the time they had spent previously on active duty, plus the new time, gave them a total of 20 years of active duty; and they then qualified under Public Law 305, so the Navy thought, for retirement at half pay or the number of years times two and a half.

Then the Comptroller General said, "You cannot reretire these people; they have already been retired to the honorary list, and when you call a man back to active duty from the naval honorary list he has to revert back to the honorary retired list and is not eligible for retirement under Public Law 305.

This corrects that inequity, because those people and the Navy thought, of course, that they were entitled when the new law passed to count all of their active-duty time that they had spent in the past toward retirement.

Mr. PRICE. Will this correct this only for these particular cases, or for——

Mr. BLANDFORD. There is not anything comparable in the Army, that I know of.

Mr. PRICE. On the question of rank, there is.

Mr. BLANDFORD. I do not——

Mr. PRICE. This would not correct it on the question of rank? For instance, if a man were called off the retirement list as a colonel and subsequently became a general, would he revert back to the retired list as a colonel or could he be retired as a general?

Mr. BLANDFORD. You see, you have this situation: The people who were on the retired list originally were commanders, lieutenant commanders, a rear admiral, and some captains. As Commander Martineau has indicated, only one officer was recalled from the honorary list and promoted.

Digitized by Google

Mr. PRICE. I understand that, but what I want to know is whether this would cover the situation in general, or just this particular group?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Just for this particular group, because the other people who were on a retired list—not an honorary list, but a retired list—are eligible for the highest rank attained. They revert to the retired list, but with the highest rank they attained.

Mr. PRICE. The Comptroller General has ruled differently.

Mr. BLANDFORD. No. You see, they revert, but they revert with the highest rank attained.

Mr. PRICE. They revert to their previous rank on the retired list. That is something we should go into, I think, Mr. Chairman.

Commander MARTINEAU. Not in the Navy, sir.

Mr. BLANDFORD. I see what you mean, in the Army.

Mr. KILDAY. This law only applies to the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did not we pass this law in the last Congress, that is, through the House? We had this problem up once, and I think we passed it in the House.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct; the House did pass this bill last year.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought so.

Commander MARTINEAU. Near the end of the session.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Commander MARTINEAU. And it did not get through the Senate.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think I should call to the attention of the subcommittee, so the record will show that we considered this, the fact that this proposed law states that the term "Reserve components," as used in section 6 of the act approved February 21, 1946—which is Public Law 305—shall include officers on the honorary retired list of the Naval Reserve or Marine Corps Reserve.

Now, title III of Public Law 810, the well-known retirement law, provides that Reserves may be retired.

Now, the question may well arise—and I think anything we may say in the record may help the Comptroller General to make up his mind on this point—whether people who are now on the honorary retired list who may possibly be eligible for retirement under Public Law 810 may not be eligible if he applies the same reasoning as he has to this group—unless you construe section 301 (b) to protect this group—which says that the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to establish a United States Naval Reserve retired list, to include the names of all officers and enlisted personnel of the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves who are granted retired pay under the provisions of this title, the provisions of Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress, or any law hereafter enacted to provide retired pay for such officers and enlisted personnel.

Now, it says "Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress," which was then in existence, and the Comptroller General has ruled that people from the honorary retired list are not members of the Reserve components for purposes of Public Law 305.

Our record should indicate, negatively or affirmatively, that we consider the phrase "Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress" as amended by this bill to include these people, so that they will be eligible for retirement under title III of Public Law 810.

I do not know if I made that clear, but you have a very technical point there which is liable to come up in the future as to the retirement of Reserves. The Navy is not particularly concerned, because they believe that the Comptroller General will rule that these people are eligible. But I think the record should show that we also considered it.

Commander MARTINEAU. Could I make a comment on just one point you raised there, Mr. Blandford? I do not believe it will be so much a matter of these particular people being able to qualify under 810——

Mr. BLANDFORD. No; not these.

Commander MARTINEAU. Because they are already retired. It is other people on the retired list who do not qualify under this but will qualify under 810.

Mr. BLANDFORD. There may be a substantial number of people who will in the future, upon attaining the age of 60, and meeting all the qualifications of title III of Public Law 810, be eligible for Reserve retirement, unless the Comptroller General again says that, once on the honorary retirement list, you never can be reretired under the provisions of title III of Public Law 810.

Mr. ELSTON. Could not we add a section to this act and take care of it so there would never be any question about it?

Mr. BLANDFORD. It is not considered absolutely necessary, Mr. Elston, as far as the Navy is concerned, because this bill now applies only to the Navy, and they feel that the Comptroller General will rule in their favor.

If the record shows that we consider that these people now on the honorary retired list will be included as members of the Reserve components under Public Law 305, it will be sufficient to enable them to qualify for retirement under Public Law 810 upon attaining the age 60. The only catch would be as to whether Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress, as mentioned in Public Law 810, applies only to Public Law 305 as it then existed, because this phrase does not say "Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress, now in effect, or as may be hereafter amended."

Mr. JOHNSON. In the hearings on that bill, I do not think we ever referred to anybody on an honorary list. I do not remember any such testimony.

Commander MARTINEAU. Well, 810, Mr. Johnson, I believe you will recall, addressed itself to the honorary retired list to this extent: It excluded people on the honorary retired list from counting time spent on the honorary retired list for credits under 810.

Mr. JOHNSON. Frankly, I do not remember that, and I sat through all the hearings. But it probably was brought out, if you remember it.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is a provision in the law as it was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it was intended to cover this kind of a case; do you not? Or we ought to cover it, I think.

Commander MARTINEAU. Certainly it would be an injustice if those people were held off because a person on the honorary retired list, without pay, who qualified for 810 should get it, certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you not think it best, like Mr. Elston mentioned, if we want to do that, to make a specific reference to this act, so there will be no doubt about it? Otherwise, you will be back again with another similar situation later on?

Commander MARTINEAU. I believe it would, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Well, will you suggest language to accomplish that?

Commander MARTINEAU. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. COLE. I should like to inquire of Commander Martineau if tion 2 of this bill does not clarify the thing the way that you feel should be clarified, by making this bill retroactive to February 21, 46. This bill amends Public Law 305, to which you refer, as of bruary 21, 1946. Now, your Public Law 810 was passed after bruary 21, 1946. So, this amendment would be included within provisions of 810.

Commander MARTINEAU. Well, I would be afraid of only one ng, Mr. Cole. This bill and the problem we are talking about this rning refer only to those persons on the honorary retired list who ve qualified for pay under Public Law 305. Now, we have many ier people on the honorary retired list who have not and will not alify for pay under Public Law 305, but in due time they may come eligible to receive retired pay under Public Law 810. That the problem. We are afraid, from other decisions that the Comp-ller has made, that he will say, "Yes; this man has met all the quali-ations of 810, but he is on the honorary retired list at age 60, and is not in the Navy for this purpose."

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that is especially persuasive, because we erred there to those on the honorary list and cut out the right to mpute the time that they were on the list as an honorary member.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is right, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. And he might reason from that as you stated, unless put a provision in this bill that it would not take effect.

Commander MARTINEAU. It would certainly settle it beyond all ubt if you would write it into this bill.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Well, if you are going to make that change we ight just as well raise the point that the Senate raised after they d passed the bill concerning the retroactive features of the bill. If u make one amendment, you might just as well make the other endment: that no retroactive pay increase shall accrue to persons retofore compensated under the provisions of section 310 of the aval Reserve Act of 1938.

Commander MARTINEAU. Well, I have been thinking about that d I believe if you put that in it may discriminate against one ficer here.

Mr. BLANDFORD. The one who was promoted?

Commander MARTINEAU. It will discriminate against Captain eighton.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Who would be eligible otherwise to receive retire-ent at the highest rank attained?

Commander MARTINEAU. There were three people who received ay under 305 for a period of a year. They now face a retroactive eckage.

Mr. KILDAY. I would suggest that Commander Martineau and r. Blandford confer on this and bring us some suggested language.

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

Commander MARTINEAU. All right, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. You might explore with the Army and Air Force hether they have a comparable situation which should be taken are of in this bill.

Mr. BLANDFORD. All right, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. When would you be ready with that?

Mr. BLANDFORD. We can do it this afternoon, I am sure, and have t ready tomorrow morning, if necessary.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KILDAY. Is anything scheduled for tomorrow?

Mr. BLANDFORD. I do not know of any subcommittee meeting being scheduled.

Actually, if the committee would like to report the bill with suggested amendments——

Mr. COLE. I think we had better look at it, first.

Mr. PRICE. Would it be germane to bring the Army and Air Force retirement situation, on an equal footing with the Navy, also in this bill, or would that be going too far?

Mr. BLANDFORD. The only thing wrong with that, Mr. Price, is that that is very likely to get into a controversial issue. This particular act is aimed at the relief of four people who now face checkage, and five people who are not eligible for something that they really should be eligible for. If we raise a controversial issue it might either kill the bill or delay it just that much longer.

Mr. KILDAY. Suppose you get ready and we will meet again on it in the morning. It will not take us long.

Mr. BLANDFORD. All right, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see how anybody in the Army or Navy is concerned.

Commander MARTINEAU. I do not think they have a comparable problem.

Mr. KILDAY. Do we have anything else today?

Mr. BLANDFORD. No, sir; that is the only thing today.

Mr. KILDAY. Then we will go ahead tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 10:35 a. m., the subcommittee adjourned.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3,
Friday, February 25, 1949.

The subcommittee met, at 10 a. m., Hon. Paul J. Kilday, chairman presiding.

Mr. KILDAY. The committee will be in order.

When we adjourned yesterday, Mr. Blandford and Commander Martineau were to confer on a proposed amendment. I believe you have one ready?

Mr. BLANDFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. You can read it.

Mr. BLANDFORD. We have written the following amendment which we think will solve the problem of members on the honorary retired list who might otherwise be ineligible for retirement under title III of Public Law 810. We suggest the following language: Strike out the period on line 8, insert a comma and add the words: and that the term "Naval and Marine Corps Reserve," as used in subsection (b) of section 301, Public Law 810, shall include officers and enlisted personnel on the honorary retired list of the Naval Reserve or Marine Corps Reserve established by section 309 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, as amended, 34 U. S. C., 855 h.

301 (b) of Public Law 810, title III, states:

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to establish a United States Naval Reserve retired list to include the names of all officers and enlisted personnel of

Digitized by Google

Naval and Marine Corps Reserve who are granted retired pay under the pro-ons of this title, the provisions of Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress, or law hereafter enacted to provide retired pay for such officers and enlisted onnel.

This amendment, therefore, will include or make eligible those ple on the naval honorary retired list who might otherwise not be ible because of having previously been retired to the honorary red list.

t does not in any manner attempt to establish any new qualifican under title III of Public Law 810. In other words, all of the er requirements must be met, but this will avoid the pitfall that ne of these people have innocently fallen into by allowing themselves be placed on the honorary retired list, all of which took place, of rse, before the retirement of Reserves was ever contemplated.
t in view of the previous decision of the Comptroller General, it s felt that the Comptroller General might well rule in the future
t having been once retired on the honorary retired list such persons uld henceforth not be eligible to be retired again under Public w 810. We feel that this amendment will avoid that situation.

I have asked also Colonel Lancefield of the Army to state the posi-n of the Army with regard to this amendment and to this proposed islation and to the problem that arose yesterday as to an honorary ired list for the Army. There is such a list, but it is not statutory. is a departmental list. And I have asked Colonel Lancefield to plain that to us. If I may ask Colonel Lancefield to testify.

Mr. KILDAY. Commander Martineau, you agree with the state-nt Mr. Blandford has made with reference to the effect of this endment as it relates to the question that was raised yesterday?

Commander MARTINEAU. I do, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Let us hear from the colonel.

Colonel LANCEFIELD. I am Colonel Lancefield, of the legislative d liaison of the Army, and I have here with me Colonel Woodbury, ersonnel and Administration Division.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, Mr. Blandford's atement as to our situation and position is accurate and correct in l respects. We have an honorary retired list in the Army which nlike the one for the Navy established in the Naval Reserve Act of 938 was simply created by a departmental order in 1946, for the varius categories of persons in it. The basic qualification was that an fficer, to be on the honorary retired list must have served 15 years r be retired for physical disability or have served during an emer-ency. It was purely an honorary recognition of those who had ren-ered creditable service in the Army. And at the time it was estabished it was not intended to and did not entail or provide any pay or moluments or any other privileges except the recognition.

The Army has no opposition to S. 278 nor to the suggested amendnent thereto.

I might say that there are and will remain certain other problems with regard to title III of Public Law 810, with respect to the interpretation and the qualification. And we have been and are studying those. However, I do not understand it is the purpose of your committee to go into those at this time.

Mr. KILDAY. But you have no situation comparable to that confronting this small group affected by the bill?

Digitized by Google

Colonel LANCEFIELD. No, sir, we have no comparable situation because since our honorary retired list is purely a departmental order it does not have any efficacy or effect so far as the retirement or the return of people thereto would be concerned.

Mr. KILDAY. Not being statutory, you do not contemplate any difficulty through the Comptroller General's office of a ruling that it then constituted retirement and that the man could not subsequently be retired?

Colonel LANCEFIELD. No, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And it is actually not retirement because it is not established by statute?

Colonel LANCEFIELD. No, sir. The point has not thus far been raised and I do not believe it is necessary for us to anticipate it.

Mr. KILDAY. Any further questions?

(No response.)

Mr. BLANDFORD. There is one other point, Mr. Chairman, that should be inserted in the record and that is the question of costs. In order to clarify that situation, Commander Martineau would like to explain that this proposed legislation will not involve any new obligation of funds in view of the fact that funds have already been set aside for the amount that has been checked and in the 1950 fiscal budget there is a sum set aside to pay these people that are taken care of in this proposed legislation.

Mr. KILDAY. Did you want to elaborate on that, Commander?

Commander MARTINEAU. Well, it is not necessary to elaborate much further on what Mr. Blandford has just said, except to again emphasize to this committee that this bill does not involve the expenditure of any additional money to the Government. We referred to certain sums yesterday, but that is money that is already appropriated for, but under this particular decision has been withheld and this bill, if it is enacted, will simply authorize that money to now be expended.

Mr. KILDAY. And relieve the officers from paying back the checks that have been made against them?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct ,sir.

Mr. KILDAY. That money has already been expended. It just relieves them of the obligation of repaying to the Government the amount that they had received.

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir. And, of course, you understand that the retired pay that we thought these people were entitled to has been entirely withheld from them.

Mr. KILDAY. That is right.

Mr. HÉBERT. In other words, there is no money that has been paid to them that would have to be given back in the event this legislation were not adopted?

Commander MARTINEAU. There is.

Mr. HÉBERT. Oh, there is?

Commander MARTINEAU. There is.

Mr. HÉBERT. Besides that which is being held now?

Commander MARTINEAU. That is correct, sir. They were paid for a period of about a year.

Mr. HÉBERT. Yes.

Commander MARTINEAU. And then the Comptroller General's decision was made, their payment was stopped and they owed the overnment that much money. Now, of course, since the date eir pay was stopped under the law under which they retired they ve accumulated some more, but that has not been paid them.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HÉBERT. That has been held in escrow?

Commander MARTINEAU. Right.

Mr. BLANDFORD. I might also add, Mr. Chairman, that with this nendment, of course, we are not confining this legislation to the nine rsons that were involved in the original legislation. I think that ould be noted in the record, that the language here will apply to all ose who would be otherwise eligible, who are now on the honorary tired list insofar as retirement under title III is concerned. We are king care of possibly a larger problem, even though this bill is aimed rectly at the 9 persons.

Mr. KILDAY. That is just in case other cases should develop?

Mr. BLANDFORD. This is anticipatory of a Comptroller General's cision which might preclude people on the honorary retired list from herwise qualifying for retirement under title III of Public Law 810 view of the fact that they have already been retired on the honorary tired list:

Mr. HÉBERT. Well, the language of your bill is all-inclusive?

Mr. BLANDFORD. It is now with the amendment, yes, sir.

Mr. HÉBERT. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. If there is no objection, we will take up for considera- on S. 278, covering the same subject, which has already passed the nate, rather than House Bill 1761.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move a favorable——

Mr. KILDAY. First on the amendment.

Mr. HÉBERT. I move that S. 278 be amended in accordance with ie language that was submitted by the staff.

Mr. KILDAY. Is there objection?

(No response.)

Mr. KILDAY. If not, the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman. I move a favorable adoption of .278 as amended.

Mr. KILDAY. All those in favor, signify by saying "Aye."

(Chorus of "Aye".)

Mr. KILDAY. Those opposed, "No".

(No response.)

Mr. KILDAY. The bill will be reported.

Mr. BLANDFORD. There is no other business, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KILDAY. We will stand adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 10:40 a. m., the committee adjourned.)

SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS ON S. 629 AND H. R. 2434 TO AUTHORIZE THE DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN LOST, ABANDONED, OR UNCLAIMED PERSONAL PROPERTY COMING INTO THE POSSESSION OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THE DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, THE DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, OR THE DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3,
Tuesday, February 15, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham (chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The next bill is S. 629, companion bill H. R. 2434. Who is here to testify?

Colonel MUNSON. Colonel Romain, from the Office of Quartermaster General.

Mr. DURHAM. Colonel, will you please proceed.

Colonel ROMAIN. I have a statement here, sir, which I will read, with your permission.

Mr. DURHAM. All right. Proceed to read your statement.

AN ACT To authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property coming into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, respectively, are hereby authorized to dispose of by sale or otherwise, one year after date of receipt, all lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property which is now or may hereafter come into the possession, custody, or control of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, as the case may be: Provided, That an effort shall be made to determine and locate the owner or owners thereof, or their legal representatives, and that in all cases where the owner thereof, or legal representative, has been determined the property shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of for a period of ninety days after written notice has been sent to his last known address.

SEC. 2. The net proceeds received from the sale of any such property by the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 3. Claims for the net proceeds, if any, of such property so disposed of may be filed with the General Accounting Office by the rightful owners or their legal representatives at any time prior to the expiration of three years from the date of the disposal of the property and, if not so filed, are barred from being acted on by either courts or the accounting officers.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, respectively, are authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and provisions of this Act.

SEC. 5. Any property coming within the provisions of this Act which may be delivered to the Soldier's Home under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Army or the Secretary of the Air Force shall be limited to papers of value, sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, or other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes.

SEC. 6. This Act shall not be construed as amending or repealing the Act of March 29, 1918 (40 Stat. 499); article 112 of section 1, chapter 11, of the Act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 809); the Act of February 21, 1931 (46 Stat. 1203); the Act of December 28, 1945 (59 Stat. 662), as amended; or the Act of August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 846–847), as amended.

Passed the Senate February 8, 1949.

Colonel ROMAIN. Following is a brief résumé of factual data on the proposed legislation to authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property coming into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes.

This property consists of a miscellaneous assortment of cartons, chests, footlockers, crates, wooden boxes, traveling bags, and suitcases, containing all types of civilian clothing, men's and women's, including trousers, shirts, dresses, underwear, et cetera. This property was generated as a result of mass movement of troops during the war years during which a tremendous amount of personal property was lost, abandoned, or remains unclaimed.

Extensive efforts have been made to locate the owners of this property without success. The Departments have concentrated this lost property at central locations and are now desirous of further disposition of it. The property was received at our central agencies from five main sources: (a) Common carriers; (b) oversea concentration points; (c) collected from the battlefield; (d) ports of embarkation; (e) posts, camps, and stations in the United States.

There are approximately 258 tons of the above property stored at the Army Effects Bureau, Kansas City, Mo., and the New York, Seattle, and San Francisco ports. This represents about 10 freight carloads. At the present time, there is no way of determining how large a quantity will continue to return from oversea theaters.

About a week ago this office received a call from the New York Port of Embarkation with reference to disposition instructions for approximately 200 containers of unclaimed baggage. Instructions were issued that this baggage was to be shipped to the Kansas City depot.

With reference to section 5 of the proposed bill, property designated for the Soldiers' Home is of such nature that it is valued principally as keepsake and does not represent too much in the way of dollar value.

The 1-year holding-period requirement is necessary, based on the condition of the property and on past experience of attempted disposition. On one occasion, the Army Effects Bureau at Kansas City, Mo., opened and inventoried 1,200 cases that had been on hand from 12 to 18 months. Less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the containers opened were disposed of to the rightful owners.

In the event this bill is passed, it will enable the departments indicated above to dispose of lost, abandoned, or unclaimed baggage in minimum of time which will result in the release of valuable storage ace and personnel for other missions.

Mr. DURHAM. Does that complete your statement?

Colonel ROMAIN. That is our statement, yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Are there any questions?

Mr. BLACKNEY. Every effort, I assume, has been made to contact e lawful owner, if such were possible?

Colonel ROMAIN. That is correct, yes, sir. Addresses are obtained om the Adjutant General and notifications that the property is ere are sent out.

Mr. ARENDS. What does this constitute mostly—clothing and ings of that nature?

Colonel ROMAIN. Mostly clothing and personal effects. But there e also some souvenirs.

Mr. ARENDS. And these will be turned over to the Soldiers' Home?

Colonel ROMAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. In other words, it will be mostly disposition of othing?

Colonel ROMAIN. The disposition of clothing, yes, sir.

Mr. ARENDS. And this has all accumulated from World War II—ost of it?

Colonel ROMAIN. Yes, sir; principally from World War II.

Mr. ARENDS. You have held most of it about 3 years, then—or 4 ars?

Colonel ROMAIN. Some of it over that time, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Could you dispose of this property through your gular established Quartermaster stores?

Colonel ROMAIN. No, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. You couldn't do that?

Colonel ROMAIN. Our regulations don't permit us to do that. This roperty does not belong to the Government.

Mr. ARENDS. What is the approximate value of it?

Colonel ROMAIN. I couldn't give you that, sir. It would just be a uess.

Mr. ARENDS. A lot of it is not invery good shape, I imagine?

Colonel ROMAIN. No, sir; it isn't valuable. We don't think it is aluable from a money standpoint.

Mr. DURHAM. It would give you authority to dispose of it without ringing it all the way back to the United States, at heavy expense, o the port of embarkation from overseas?

Colonel ROMAIN. I didn't quite understand your statement.

Mr. DURHAM. Would it give you authority to dispose of it before you brought it back to the coast of America?

Colonel ROMAIN. No, sir. It must be brought here and held at least for a year before you can dispose of it.

Mr. DURHAM. Any objections to the bill?

Mr. ARENDS. Let me ask one more question. In the event some of these items were placed in the care of the Soldiers' Home and eventually the rightful owner came in with a claim, would he get them back again?

Colonel ROMAIN. There is a provision in the bill for claims. It is section three, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. I am afraid he would never get it if he filed a claim under all the red tape it involves.

Digitized by Google

Colonel ROMAIN. He might not get it.

Mr. DURHAM. Couldn't you write a more simple provision of giving the Secretary of the Army the right to restore it to him, without going through the General Accounting Office? Would it be possible?

Colonel ROMAIN. That is the normal procedure for these funds which are not apparently the property of somebody at the time they generate.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman, the distinction to be drawn here is that this is not the property itself but the proceeds from the sale of the property.

I might say, sir, the bill, as you can see from the corrections penciled on it, requires a large number of corrective amendments. There is a number of drafting changes that I belive the committee will agree are necessary to this piece of legislation.

I may suggest, sir, that the bill be either held over until these corrections are made and submitted to the committee as a new bill or that the committee strike out all after the enacting clause of it and engage in a drafting process here this morning, whichever the committee would prefer to do.

Mr. DURHAM. Are the Departments in accord on the amendments?

Mr. HARLOW. I brought them to the attention of the Departments, and they are in substantial agreement with the changes suggested.

Colonel MUNSON. That is right.

Mr. ARENDS. I made a motion that we carry this bill over until these changes can be made, if that is in agreement with the Department.

Mr. DURHAM. It is so ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3,
Thursday, February 24, 1949.

The subcommittee met at 10 o'clock a. m., Hon. Carl T. Durham (chairman) presiding.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee will come to order.

We have again before us S. 629, an act to authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property coming into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes.

Has the Department someone here this morning to explain the changes made to this bill and to relate what their significance is?

Colonel ROMAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Give your full name to the reporter, Colonel.

STATEMENT BY LT. COL. COLEMAN ROMAIN, QUARTERMASTER CORPS, OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENREAL

Colonel ROMAIN. My name is Lt. Col. Coleman Romain.

Mr. DURHAM. Colonel Romain, please have a seat and tell us what changes have been made in this bill.

Colonel ROMAIN. This bill came up last week, Mr. Chairman; and, pursuant to discussion between Mr. Harlow and the Legislative and

Digitized by Google

Liaison Division of the Army, your committee has been furnished a redraft of the bill, and in connection with the redraft of the bill I would like to make this statement.

Mr. DURHAM. All right, you may proceed, Colonel.

Colonel ROMAIN. It is desired to call your attention to the fact that the second proviso of section 1 of the revised bill is a mandatory requirement that papers of value, sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, or other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes shall not be sold but disposed of as provided in section 5 of this act.

It is believed that unless this provision is made optional a great amount of property such as medals, trinkets, and decorations will accumulate at the Soldiers' Home that would impose a burden on them and make them a depot or a warehouse and that is contrary to what we are trying to do. So to preclude this, it is suggested that the second proviso in section 1 be stricken and that section 1 be further amended as follows:

Add after the word "respectively," and before the word "are" in line 4, the following: "subject to the provisions of section 5 of this act."

Mr. DURHAM. Is that all of your statement?

Colonel ROMAIN. That is all I have to say at the moment, sir, in connection with our proposed redraft which was made after consulting with Mr. Harlow.

Mr. DURHAM. Are you speaking now of the second draft exclusively?

Colonel ROMAIN. Yes.

Mr. DURHAM. The second draft would delete the second proviso of section 1?

Colonel ROMAIN. The second proviso; yes, sir.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Are you finished, Colonel?

Colonel ROMAIN. I am finished unless there is any discussion or unless you have any questions.

Mr. DURHAM. Are there any questions?

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Doyle.

Mr. DOYLE. Calling your attention to the middle of the first page of the redraft, in the middle of paragraph 1, after the word "Provided," it says "That an effort shall be made to determine and locate the owner or owners thereof." I am a lawyer at home. I am not yet fully familiar with your parliamentary procedure, but this point should be made: You are undertaking in this bill to sell property which may be of some commercial value to some person, provided you can locate that person.

The bill should require something stronger than just an effort. It ought to be "due effort" or "reasonable effort." The way the bill is now written the requirement is not stringent enough.

Colonel ROMAIN. The Army would have no objection to such a change, sir. We do make a diligent effort.

Mr. DOYLE. What effort do you make?

Colonel ROMAIN. I would like Major Conlon, who is in charge of the Army Effects Bureau, to tell you what effort is made.

Mr. DOYLE. Let me make a further observation and, when the major answers, all of it can be answered at once. Five or six lines below my other amendment the bill says, "in all cases where the owner or owners thereof, or his or their legal representative or representatives, has or have been determined." I notice in drafting it you left out "his or their heirs or next of kin." In other words, after the word "Provided," you say: "That an effort shall be made to determine and locate the owner or owners thereof, his or their heirs or next of kin, or his or their legal representative or representatives," then the third line below that you drop the language "his or their heirs or next of kin."

Digitized by Google

You limit the requirement of notice to 120 days to the owners and legal representatives. Why aren't you required to give notice of intention to sell to the heirs or next of kin, if you locate them?

Colonel ROMAIN. Major Conlon, could you give an answer to that?

Mr. DURHAM. Can you answer this question, Major?

STATEMENT BY MAJ. WILLIAM CONLON, QUARTERMASTER CORPS, ARMY EFFECTS BUREAU, KANSAS CITY

Major CONLON. Mr. Chairman, in most cases this property that comes into the Army Effects Bureau at Kansas City is unknown and unidentifiable. We have in most instances tried to determine by an inventory of the property and also by checking the property itself with respect to various marks, and so forth, to whom it belonged. We made every effort to determine who the next of kin are but we have been unsuccessful. So, consequently, this property is piling up in storage and in most cases it is just a lot of junk and we have no way of disposing of it.

Now, if by chance, there is some method of identifying the next of kin, the individuals are informed, giving them all the pertinent facts and descriptions of the property. They then express a desire either to have the property shipped to them or their desire that they do not want it.

Mr. CLEMENTE. I take it, then, you have no objection to including "his or their heirs or next of kin" in that language?

Major CONLON. We have no objection. We have no objection to either of your amendments.

Mr. DOYLE. I think we ought to include the term "reasonable effort."

Mr. CLEMENTE. Is there a set pattern of effort you do make, Major, in order to locate the next of kin or heirs?

Major CONLON. No; unless we can determine from the property who would be interested in it.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Suppose you did. Would it be a set pattern then?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir. We inform the people, giving a description of the property and the quantities.

Mr. DURHAM. How large a place do you have now in which to store this property?

Major CONLON. We have a portion of the Kansas City depot. It is not a record center.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Do you have any objection to adding the word "diligent" before the word "effort" to make it read, "a diligent effort shall be made to determine and locate the owner or owners"?

Major CONLON. No; I have no objection.

Mr. DURHAM. At the present time your storage is on Government property?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. How much personnel is required to take care of this property? How many Army people? I understand you handle the Army and Navy property; is that correct?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. The Navy Department is not doing anything like this?

Major CONLON. I believe that they have some property at one of their depots but we have approximately 250 tons in our storage at Kansas City. We have a small quantity at two of the ports, Seattle and New York, and only recently we shipped approximately a carload from the New York port of embarkation into Kansas City.

Mr. DURHAM. And the Government pays the expense of that transportation all the way to Kansas City?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. And that is the only place you are disposing of this property at the present time?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. You did not say how many people were involved in taking care of and looking after this property.

Major CONLON. The Army Effects Center personnel consists of 50 people at the present time. Only 12 of those are warehouse personnel. The others are administrative personnel handling the records, not only for the unidentifiable property but for the notifying of the next of kin.

Mr. DURHAM. Is any of this personnel civilian?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir; civilian personnel. It would amount to about 12 people, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Involving quite an expense during the year?

Major CONLON. Yes; and it is piling up with no outlet for its disposition. We are attempting to close out this Effects Bureau by June of this year.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Major, will you require some sort of staff to process this property whether you store it or not, in order to comply with the law, in the event you try to identify the property and notify the next of kin? That would require some sort of staff, would it not?

Major CONLON. Yes, sir; but we have that staff at the present time.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Would the storage of this material require you to enlarge your staff to a great extent if you keep going on this way?

Major CONLON. No; but it would be an indefinable time—we would just continue to hold it to no purpose.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you occasionally ship out some of it when you locate the owners or has it come to the point that you can't locate the owners of any of it?

Major CONLON. We have approximately 7,500 cases at the present time where we can't determine who the property belongs to and it averages about 29 pounds to the case. And then, of course, that is added to by the effects sent in that are picked up at the ports and at some of these posts, camps and stations.

Mr. DURHAM. Have you people made any effort to advertise in the journals or give notice in any way that there is a large amount of lost property stored and that you cannot locate the owners? Have you made any effort to advertise that fact?

Major CONLON. To my knowledge, no. I do not know what the results would be that that would bring.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. It would be necessary, I think, just to put it in the Journal or Register or other such publication. You can carry it as a news item.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Except that would cause people to come and try to identify property and in turn make more work. Have you had any requests for any of this property from the Veterans of Foreign War posts or from American Legion posts, or does all this property go to the Old Sodiers' Home?

Major CONLON. No; it does not go to the Old Soldiers' Home except keepsake items like sabers and medals, and so forth. The clothing is mostly civilian clothing—miscellaneous shirts and socks, and so forth—which stays at Kansas City and I do not know who would be interested in that except the owners because it has been worn.

Mr. DURHAM. Can't you give it to some of these organizations which are collecting clothing at the present time and shipping it to overseas areas? What would be wrong with that?

Major CONLON. Nothing would be wrong with that, sir, if someone would be willing to sort it, classify it, and so forth.

Mr. DURHAM. Give the old clothing to the Red Cross.

Mr. CLEMENTE. My point is that in American Legion posts, there are welfare officers and relief officers who can probably use the clothes and this would support their efforts. The Red Cross could do a job with that clothing, too.

Mr. DURHAM. There are so many American Legion posts, and they are so scattered over the United States, that it would be very difficult to divide this clothing on the basis of equality.

Mr. CLEMENTE. It would be done only in response to requests for the property.

Mr. DURHAM. Does the Department object to putting in a provision enabling you to turn this clothing over to the Red Cross?

Major CONLON. No, sir; I don't believe there is any objection to that.

Colonel ROMAIN. The point has just been made, Mr. Chairman, that this merchandise at the Army Effects Bureau is similar to the post office's dead-letter operation. Nobody knows to whom it belongs or what is in it.

Mr. CLEMENTE. You can auction it off then?

Colonel ROMAIN. We want to get rid of it. We want to sell it.

Mr. CLEMENTE. That is what happens at the post office.

Colonel ROMAIN. Yes; if you want to give it away. Our primary purpose is to get rid of it and get it out of our hands. We have the job of caring for it and we have it taking up our warehouse space.

Mr. DURHAM. I suppose you have Government uniforms?

Colonel ROMAIN. No, sir; that is Government property. Those are all withdrawn. There is no Government property involved.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Unless it is an officer's uniform.

Colonel ROMAIN. I do not know what is done with officers' uniforms. They do not belong to the Government.

Mr. DOYLE. Do you have any idea what the gross returns on these auctions might be?

Major CONLON. It is hard to determine that, sir.

Mr. DOYLE. Is it a matter of hundreds of dollars or a few thousand dollars?

Major CONLON. Probably a few thousand dollars.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, in respect to the word "notice" in the proposed draft, would it be an expense to the Government to send a registered letter? As you may know, under our post-office regulations a registered mail letter is more apt to reach an heir or next of kin than an ordinary letter. It seems to me if this property runs into several thousands of dollars in an auction, the heirs of a dead soldier or his next of kin, if he has disappeared, are entitled to more notice than just a letter dropped into the mail, especially with regard to such items as medals.

It might be, in regard to medals and insignia and decorations, there should be a requirement of a registered letter going to the next of kin if you have located such a person, because such items are not the same as discarded clothing. A medal given to a man, it seems to me, is a family heirloom. It is a matter of patriotic possession and something that is certainly worth 25 or 30 cents in the form of a registered letter. A registered letter follows clear through, as you know. The post office goes the limit to find the addressee if a letter is registered; it does not follow through ordinary letters.

One reason I am so concerned in this is that I have personal knowledge of a couple of such cases in my own law practice at home where this problem arose and the families felt considerably hurt that they had not received notice even though the Department had tried to reach them.

I do not know what that would entail in the way of expense. Nevertheless, Section 5 of the redraft does not require any further notice or effort on the part of the Government to reach the heirs or next of kin, even though papers of value, insignia, decorations, watches, and so forth are involved. That is, the Department will have already determined that such items should be kept at the Soldiers' Home and no effort will be made to find the next of kin after it has been determined that the Department has in its possession things of value.

Mr. HARLOW. Mr. Chairman, it is the intent, even though it is not required in section 1, that such property will be transferred to the Soldiers' Home only after 1 year after receipt, during which year a diligent effort will have been made to locate the former owners.

Mr. DOYLE. The bill does not read that way.

Mr. CLEMENTE. The bill should be written to require it within 3 years.

Mr. HARLOW. A requirement has so been written. The owners have 3 years from the date of the receipt of such property by the Soldiers' Home to get it back from the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. DOYLE. I think the statute ought to provide, Mr. Chairman, in the next to the last line on page 1, this:

One hundred and twenty days after written notice by registered mail, giving time and place of intended sale.

Some people are careless and we might be able to put into the hands of many people property that would not otherwise be known of if just a notice of its existence were sent, but if they get notice that their property is going to be sold at a fixed time and fixed place, they are more apt to pay attention to it and try to protect the property against default. That may be too much detail. I presume you follow this procedure anyway.

Colonel ROMAIN. Every reasonable effort is made to do so.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DOYLE. I assume that but I think the statute should provide that the time and place of the intended sale should be given in the notice.

Mr. HARLOW. Sale or other disposition thereof.

Mr. DOYLE. Sale or disposition.

Colonel ROMAIN. We see no objection to including in the notice time and place of the intended sale or other disposition.

Mr. DOYLE. Then the heir can more reasonably protect the property.

Mr. DURHAM. Any other questions?

Mr. CLEMENTE. I did not understand the reaction to Mr. Doyle's suggestion of registered mail. If you drop a letter in the mail, that is notice according to your Department's standard, but it may never reach the addressee. What Mr. Doyle is suggesting is to register the letter so the owner will receive the notice.

Colonel ROMAIN. We see what that means.

Mr. DURHAM. It does not mean significant added expense to the Government. You intend to sell the property and recover the cost.

Colonel ROMAIN. I see.

Mr. DOYLE. You will note that on page 2 the expression "papers of value" is used. That might even be title to real estate. It could be invaluable to the heirs or next of kin.

Mr. CLEMENTE. It might be something of such personal significance as a citation.

Mr. DOYLE. It might be a birth certificate. It might be anything. It seems to me the statute ought to specify registered mail notice.

Colonel ROMAIN. There can be no objection to that except a minor technical one in that the Government gets back the money but the Quartermaster Corps operating this does not have its fund reimbursed. We would have to budget for it to carry out your instructions, but if that is the law, we would be very happy to go along with it that way.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Shall we write in this "by registered mail"?

Mr. DOYLE. Yes. I think "by registered mail."

Colonial ROMAIN. There could be a great deal of confusion here because in a good deal of this property the ownership cannot be determined.

Mr. HARLOW. You are covered for that.

Mr. CLEMENTE. If you did locate an heir, he would like to be given the opportunity of first claiming it.

Colonel ROMAIN. Certainly, such a requirement would work no hardship on us and work out for the benefit of everyone concerned.

Mr. DURHAM. If you locate him you send him a registered letter. If you don't locate him, you don't have to. You do this locating entirely by your own effort?

Colonel ROMAIN. By use of the information we have in our files, sir.

Mr. DOYLE. I move, Mr. Chairman, that those changes be inserted in the proper places.

Mr. DURHAM. The clerk will read the bill and we will offer the redraft, as amended, as a substitute for the present bill.

Mr. HARLOW. If I may suggest, sir, instead of reading the bill, we read the revised draft?

Mr. DURHAM. All right. The clerk will read.

Mr. HARLOW (reading):

Mr. DURHAM. That is the offered amendment there?

Mr. HARLOW. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Let us write this language in here so we will have e amended version.

Mr. HARLOW. Strike out the word "an" in the proposed bill and sert in its place the word "diligent."

Mr. DURHAM. Proceed with your reading.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, at this time I will offer an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of S. 629 and insert the language just read by the professional staff member.

Mr. CLEMENTE. S. 629 makes no reference to property turned over to the Navy. What happens to that property? Section 5 deals only with property which may be delivered to the Soldiers' Home by the Secretary of the Army or the Secretary of the Air Force. What happens to Navy equipment?

Mr. HARLOW. In the case of the Navy, the property is also turned over the the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. DURHAM. Doesn't that happen to Navy property?

Mr. HARLOW. The testimony of the witness was that the Army had Navy property as well.

Major CONLON. We do not have any Navy property at Kansas City. That is at Hill Field.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Do you have any Navy paraphernalia?

Major CONLON. No, sir.

Mr. CLEMENTE. It says the property coming into the possession of the Army and Air Force goes to the Soldier's Home. What happens to the Navy property? Section 5 talks of any property coming within the provisions of this act which may be delivered to the Soldiers' Home under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Army or the Secretary of the Air Force shall be limited to papers of value, sabers, insignia, and so forth. But if you happen to get some Navy property that falls into this category, what happens to it?

Major CONLON. The Navy would dispose of it, sir. Do you have anything on that, Colonel?

Mr. CLEMENTE. The Department of the Navy is mentioned all through the rest of the bill. I just wondered what happened to their stuff.

Mr. HARLOW. As far as I am aware, and I don't assert this as fact, there the Navy has no operation comparable to the Army's Soldiers' Home to which such property can be sent. However, I am not in a position to say where that property is sent. There is no Navy representative here to clarify that point.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Chairman, even if you have a peajacket some way should be shown to dispose of it. The peajacket, of course, would belong to the Navy, but I mean some naval trinket or item of personal property.

Mr. DURHAM. Off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. DURHAM. I would like for these statutes mentioned in section 6 of the act, to be included in the record if there is no objection. It is so ordered.

Act of March 29, 1918 (40 Stat. 499):

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Elston, do you have any question you would like ask about this measure?

Mr. ELSTON. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Do I hear a motion?

Mr. CLEMENTE. I move that in section 5, in the proviso clause, in third line, the number "three" be changed to "two."

Mr. DURHAM. If there is no objection, it is so ordered. Do I r a motion to report the bill S. 629, as amended? Mr. Blackney, you have any questions about this measure?

Mr. BLACKNEY. No.

Mr. DURHAM. Now I will entertain a motion to substitute the guage in the amendment for the provisions of S. 629.

Mr. DOYLE. I so move.

Mr. DURHAM. If there is no objection, the language is substituted the provisions of S. 629 and the bill as amended is favorably re-rted.

LL COMMITTEE HEARINGS ON H. R. 1741, H. R. 2546, H. R. 2663

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Wednesday, February 23, 1949.

he committee met, at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) siding.

he CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

he purpose of the hearing this morning is to receive reports from committees.

call Subcommittee No. 1. Have you any bill to report, Mr. ooks?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we e H. R. 1741, a bill to authorize the establishment of a joint long-ge proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes. H. R. 1741 is as follows:)

[H. R. 1741, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

ILL To authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes

e it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of erica in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby horized to establish a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and er weapons by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or manent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and utili-, within or without the continental limits of the United States, for scientific dy, testing, and training purposes by the Departments of the Army, Navy, l Air Force.

EC. 2. The Secretary of the Air Force is authorized in discharging the authority en in the preceding section to make surveys, to acquire lands and rights or other ests pertaining thereto, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, chase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, without regard to tion 3648, Revised Statutes, as amended, in administering the provisions of the t of July 9, 1942 (56 Stat. 654, 43 U. S. C., Supp. 315q).

EC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the asury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $200,000,000 to carry out the rposes of sections 1 and 2 of this Act.

EC. 4. The Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force are hereby thorized to contribute to the support of the joint long-range proving ground for ided missiles and other weapons to the extent they may deem necessary or visable, including, but not limited to, the allocation for such support of funds ailable to them for such purposes.

EC. 5. The Secretary of Defense may, at his discretion, transfer and reallocate any department, board, or agency within the National Military Establishment or any part of the authority granted herein, and, in connection with such trans- or reallocation, may transfer all or any part of the funds available for the estab- ment or support of the joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles d other weapons.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, this bill was considered by the committee in both open and executive sessions.

The bill, after consideration, was approved by the committee with o amendments, one of which is a relatively minor amendment and the other an amendment reducing the amount from $200,000,000 down to $75,000,000 which the committee thought was sufficient to take care of the cost of the long-range proving ground in its first phase. The committee recommended the approval of the bill as amended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very important bill and the purposes of the bill are very technical. So, with the permission of the Chair I would like to read to the committee the report which is well prepared and which will be filed in connection with the bill.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and other weapons. This authority contemplates the construction installation, and equipment of necessary public works, either temporary or permanent, within or without the continental limits of the United States. The proving ground is to be used jointly by the Army, Navy, and Air Force for scientific study, testing, and training purposes.

The long-range proving ground proposed by this legislation is a joint venture of the three armed services. All services have need for such a facility in varying degree, and from its inception each service has had equal representation in all phases of the planning.

The project had its inception about 3 years ago when the guided missiles committee of the Joint Chiefs of Staff recognized the necessity for a test range much longer than any existing facility; the maximum range at any present facility is 150 miles. The matter was, therefore, turned over to the Joint Research and Development Board which promptly established, in the fall of 1946, the committee on long-range proving ground, of which Brig. Gen. William L. Richardson, USA, was chairman. This committee consisted of representatives from the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and was assigned as its mission the "examination of the entire question of a single, national, long-range guided missiles proving ground."

That committee determined, first, that there exists an urgent requirement for such a facility and, secondly, as a result of its studies established the necessary characteristics of an ideal proving ground.

As a result of investigation, it was found that a facility of this character would have to be located in a relatively isolated area for reasons of safety and security. It was found also that the ultimate development of the program would require an eventual community of 13,000 inhabitants, consisting of 5,000 military and civilian employees and an estimated 8,000 dependents. Due to the necessity of establishing the installation in a sparsely populated area, it is necessary to provide to a minimum degree housing, shopping, schools, and other necessities of American life.

Testimony was received to the effect that plans for initial construction do not contemplate accommodating 13,000 persons. Only the minimum essential facilities will be included in the initial installation. And that is the reason the committee cut the amount down.

The required facilities for a long-range guided missile proving ground may be divided into three main groups:

1. A base area with suitable launching site, technical, and administrative facilities.

2. Instrumentation range at least 3,000 miles long, thoroughly instrumented by means of observation stations for the first 500 miles and with impact areas at various points along the line of flight.

Digitized by Google

3. A suitable climate for year-round operations.

Existing guided missiles proving grounds are not capable of expan-
n in length to accomplish the task of testing missiles at longer ges than 150 miles. Installations now in operation are those at ite Sands-Alamogordo, in New Mexico, Point Mugu and Inyokern California. Even apart from the inability of these facilities to ndle longer-range missiles, a survey of the work loads of existing ges by an independent committee of the Research and Develop-nt Board has disclosed that they will be saturated during the next years. The services have agreed, therefore, that the long-range ving ground may be used to test shorter range missiles so long as s work does not interfere with the primary long-range flight test sions.

For reasons of military security, the location of the proposed long-ge guided missile proving ground cannot now be disclosed. How-r, it has been ascertained that there will be no serious likelihood hazard to persons or property, or of interference with private and nmercial interests in connection with the test flying of missiles on proposed range. The danger will be very small because every sible precaution will be taken. Means will be provided to dispose missiles in the air, over a safe area, should they deviate too far off rse. Normally they will fly so high as to be impossible of detection ept with special instruments. From a safety standpoint they will no more dangerous than conventional airplane flying overhead, l from a nuisance standpoint they will be less objectionable. Most portant of all, the test range will be located in a region so sparsely abitated in the areas where there might be any danger that the zard will be wholly negligible.

The need for a facility of this type is urgent. Experts in the field convinced that guided missiles with ranges in the hundreds of les and accuracies acceptable to the military can be developed.
eir development is dependent upon the existence of a suitable range which to test them. The guided missile development program is e of our largest research and development programs in which the vestment to date has amounted to hundreds of millions of dollars.
work was started upon the construction of this facility today it would needed for testing missiles ready for flight tests before it could be ced in operation.

Missiles with ranges up to 500 miles will be ready for testing during 49, without a range of sufficient length on which to fly them. If the rvices are unable to test these and other long-range missiles at time of mpletion the entire schedule of research and development will be srupted. Certain other nations have availed themselves of the rvices of German scientists and technicians and are making vigorous forts to produce guided missiles of intercontinental ranges—and, by e way, I notice by the press dispatches that one of these was located the American occupied zone of Germany some time back. The sence of suitable facilities in this country could easily make it ssible for other nations to forge ahead of us in the development of ng-range guided missiles.

Exact predictions cannot be made at this time as to the relative portance of guided missiles or the role which they will play in any ture conflict. Our experts in this field, however, feel it quite likely at within 10 years we will be replacing present guns and bombs by guided missiles, and that within 15 years surface-to-surface guided missiles will have been perfected to a point where they will have important applications in tactical and strategic bombardment operations. These potentialities cannot ultimately be realized unless we energetically pursue research and development and operational experimentation and training.

The proposed project is vigorously supported by the Army and by the Navy. These two services have expressed the view that all the services will enjoy significant advantages as a result of intimate association with all projects conducted at such a station; moreover, it is felt that this method of operation will be most economical.

The Navy has supported the project since its inception both with material and personnel and has assigned personnel to duty with the Air Force. In addition, the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department is presently engaged in making engineering studies and designs leading to the construction of all off-shore facilities.

The proposed legislation, as submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, would have authorized a total expenditure of $200,000,000 which contemplates the eventual cost of the project. Testimony was received, however, to the effect that the first phase, representing the minimum requirements to begin operations, will require an estimated expenditure of at least $70,000,000 over a period of approximately three years. A figure of $60,000,000 was mentioned during consideration of the bill in open session by the subcommittee. This estimate, however, relates to technical requirements only and does not include the minimum requirements for housing and necessary community facilities. A complete break-down of costs furnished to the subcommittee in executive session fully supports the estimated figure of $70,000,000 needed.

Testimony further disclosed the fact that no accurate estimate can be made at this time as to the ultimate cost of construction which may be required during later phases of the long-range guided missiles project; the ceiling of $200,000,000 in the bill submitted by the National Military Establishment appears to have been merely an arbitrary figure selected at the request of the Bureau of the Budget. In view of these circumstances the committee believes it appropriate to limit the authorization to the amount which will be required for the initial phase of the project. In setting such a figure, however, it is imperative that a reasonable margin of safety be allowed to provide for contingencies in order to insure that there will be no fiscal obstacles to the effective development of this vitally important facility. Taking into consideration the difficulty of estimating the exact cost of construction of certain highly technical elements and the possibility of fluctuating construction costs, the committee believes it appropriate at this time to fix the total authorization for the project in phase one at $75,000,000 and the bill has been amended accordingly.

That the proposed legislation has the approval of the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of the Air Force is manifest from the letters which will be made a part of the report. The approval of the Departments of the Army and Navy is apparent from the testimony of the representatives of those two services in the record of hearings before the subcommittee.

Mr. Chairman, that is the report. And, as I say, the committee proved the bill.

I move, sir, that the committee report be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Brooks.

Mr. BROOKS. Together with the two amendments, Mr. Chairman: e reducing the amount to $75,000,000; and the other one, on page ines 19 and 20, to strike everything after the word "reallocate" and ert in lieu thereof the following:

he Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, or the Secretary of the Force, all, or * * *.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Brooks.

And I want to congratulate the subcommittee on having brought ut a reduction of $125,000,000.

Now, members of the committee, I think the proper procedure uld be to have the clerk read the bill in its entirety and then to ve the amendments offered. And if there are any questions that y members want to address to Mr. Brooks, why, have no hesitancy asking him any questions.

Read the bill.

Mr. HARPER. H. R.——

The CHAIRMAN. Let Mr. Brown read the bill.

Mr. HARPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

H. R. 1741

ILL to authorize the establishment of a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of erica in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby thorized to establish a joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and ier weapons by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or rmanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and ilities, within or without the continental limits of the United States, for scien- ic study, testing, and training purposes by the Departments of the Army, Navy, d air Force.

That is all of section 1.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the subcommittee chairman hether the phrase "without the continental limits of the United ates" should include foreign territory like Japan and Korea?

Mr. BROOKS. It would include any place in the whole world, where uitable arrangements were made locally, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Air Force is authorized in discharging the authority ven in the preceding section to make surveys, to acquire lands and rights or other terests pertaining thereto, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, urchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, without regard to ction 3648, Revised Statutes, as amended, in administering the provisions of the ct of July 9, 1942, 956 Stat. 654, 43 U. S. C., Supp. 315q).

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the subcommittee chairman hat section 3648 does?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Brown, we covered that. Would you mind xplaining that.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, that is the section that provides that no advanced payments shall be made unless specifically approved by the Congress, I believe. It relates to advance payments for real estate——

The CHAIRMAN. I see.

Then, there will be advance payments made?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. And that was done, Mr. Chairman—if you will pardon me—so as not to impede the immediate beginning of this.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Read section 3, then.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $200,000,000 to carry out the purposes of sections 1 and 2 of this Act.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, that is where the committee voted to reduce the amount to $75,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. The amendment is offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Brooks, to strike out $200,000,000 and substitute in lieu thereof $75,000,000.

Without objection, the amendment is temporarily agreed to.

Mr. ARENDS. May I ask the chairman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ARENDS. Was this considered in the budget this year, or is this an authorization for additional and altogether new funds?

Mr. BROOKS. That part of the money which will be needed during the coming fiscal year—about 25 million, I believe—is already included in the budget estimates for fiscal year 1950.

Mr. ARENDS. It is in the budget?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes. And although the balance of the money will not be carried in this year's appropriation, the authorization bill providing for an ultimate expenditure of $200,000,000 was cleared by the Bureau of the Budget.

Now, the services are satisfied with the amount of $75,000,000 to which the committee has reduced the original figure. They feel that they can do the job for the next 3 years. So by this reduction there will be no impediment placed in the way of the development of guided missiles projects.

Mr. ARENDS. O. K.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 4.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 4. The Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force are hereby authorized to contribute to the support of the joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and other weapons to the extent they may deem necessary or advisable, including, but not limited to, the allocation for such support of funds available to them for such purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Read section 5.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Defense may, at his discretion, transfer and reallocate to any department, board, or agency within the National Military Establishment all, or any part of, the authority granted herein, and, in connection with such transfer or reallocation, may transfer all or any part of the funds available for the establishment or support of the joint long-range proving ground for guided missiles and other weapons.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one amendment there. n page 2, lines 19 and 20, strike out everything after the word allocate" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

* * * to the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, or the retary of the Air Force, all, or * * *.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment suggested by e gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Brooks, is temporarily agreed to.
Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Short.
Mr. SHORT. Might I ask the subcommittee chairman if the ordnance anch in the Department of the Army has any objection to this bill?
Mr. BROOKS. There is no objection by anyone, Mr. Short, to the bill.
Mr. SHORT. They are all agreed?
Mr. BROOKS. They are all agreed to it. It is an interdepartmental atter. All services want it, and feel the need of a joint proving ound.
The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the clerk: Have the hearings en printed?
Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And the hearings have been before the committee w many days?
Mr. BROWN. Since last Saturday, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Then that complies with the rule.
Have the hearings been sent to all the members of the committee?
Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, what is your easure on reporting the bill as amended?
Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.
Mr. VAN ZANDT. I am wondering whether the subcommittee looked to the matter of whether the construction will be permanent or mporary at this base?
I am thinking about what is taking place in the field of guided issiles. It may be that the base they are going to establish here ay be obsolete. I wonder whether the construction will be permanent temporary?
Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Van Zandt, the committee did carefully analyze ie construction of every phase of the work. I would say that it is oing to be permanent construction. We analyzed every feature of it. 'e made a break-down. I think we were most careful, in executive ession, to cover everything. A large part of it, of course, is scientific istruments. Perhaps I might say that will account for the better art of the amount to be expended. That, of course, is difficult o analyze.
Mr. RIVERS. If the chairman will yield, it was brought out in the earing in executive session that in the event that present plans were hanged at a later date because of progress in the field of guided issiles, the site where the range is to be constructed would not be endered obsolete and could still be utilized.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, call the roll, if there are no further questions. And when your name is called, all in favor of passing the bill as mended vote "aye," and all opposed vote "no."
(Roll call.)

Digitized by Google

Mr. HARPER. Twenty-five "ayes"; none opposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is unanimously reported. And Mr. Brooks, the chairman of the subcommittee, will report the bill and prepare a resolution for a rule and submit it. And you will notify Mr. Short when you appear before the Rules Committee asking for a rule. I suggest that you try to have these rules up during the week beginning March 7.

Any further report from your subcommittee, Mr. Brooks?

Mr. BROOKS. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Durham, of Subcommittee No. 3, have you anything to report?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, we have a report on H. R. 2546, which is recommended to the committee unanimously by Subcommittee No. 3.

(H. R. 2546 is as follows:)

[H. R. 2546, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations for the national security, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby authorized to establish and develop within and without the continental limits of the United States in fulfilling the air defense responsibilities of the Department of the Air Force such land-based air warning and control installations and facilities, by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, utilities and access roads, and to provide for necessary administration and planning therefor, without regard to sections 1136, 3648, 3734, Revised Statutes, as he may deem necessary in the interest of national security.

SEC. 2. In furtherance of the above, the Secretary of the Air Force is authorized to make surveys and to acquire lands and rights pertaining thereto or other interests therein, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, and to place permanent and temporary improvements thereon whether such lands are held in fee or under lease, or under other temporary tenure.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, and when so specified in an appropriation Act such amounts shall remain available until expended.

Mr. DURHAM. Open hearings were held on this bill, and also much of the information was received in executive session.

In lieu of the report, I will read a statement which fully explains the bill. If you will listen carefully I think you can get it from this statement.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish a system of land-based aircraft warning and control facilities for the defense of the United States against attack by enemy aircraft.

Although specific and highly important air defense responsibilities are assigned to all three services, the United States Air Force is charged with responsibility for defense of the United States against air attack.

The system of land-based air warning and control installations and facilities which would be authorized by the proposed legislation is but one element of an effective system of air defense; it is, however, the indispensable element without which there can be no effective defense at all against approaching hostile aircraft.

Digitized by Google

At the outset, it should be borne in mind that an aircraft warning and control system, as its name implies, is more than a mere device for providing early warning in order to afford the civilian population a sufficient opportunity to seek shelter; on the contrary its most important function is the detection of enemy aircraft in sufficient time to permit fighter aircraft to intercept and destroy them before they have reached their targets.

A warning and control system without fighter aircraft and antiaircraft artillery would be of only slight value; but without such a system there is no conceivable manner in which either fighter planes or antiaircraft batteries can be alerted in sufficient time to permit effective defensive action.

The mere momentary detection of enemy aircraft passing a given point, while providing some degree of early warning, is not in itself sufficient for purposes of effective defense because it does not always disclose the ultimate target destination of the enemy planes, nor does it reveal where they will be at any moment between the time they are so detected and their time of arrival over the target. Without this knowledge, it would be impossible to guide fighter aircraft to a point where effective interception can be accomplished during this interim period between initial detection and arrival over target.

To accomplish the effective control and direction of interceptor aircraft, therefore, it is essential that hostile aircraft be continually tracked, once they have been detected, so that their precise location at any instant thereafter may be known.

The detection and tracking of enemy planes and the direction of our own fighters to an interception will be accomplished by radar, as was done both on land and at sea during World War II and notably during the Battle of Britain.

Radar has certain technical limitations, one of which is its inability to "see" around the horizon. Thus, although radar equipments now exist which are sufficiently powerful to transmit signals to the moon, there is no way in which a radar beam can be directed to a point around the horizon which is not in the line of sight from the transmitter. It is this feature which makes approach at low altitudes possible to elude detection by radar; the approaching aircraft merely fly in below the radar beam. Conversely, the greater the altitude of the oncoming plane the greater the range at which it can be detected.

The limitation described above reduces the effective range of a single radar installation, for all practical purposes, to a maximum of about 150 miles. This presupposes that approaching bombers will be coming in at high altitudes; to provide for low-flying planes attempting to elude radar detection it will be necessary to rely upon supplemental methods such as the use of visual spotters on the ground.

Notwithstanding its limitations, a radar warning and control system is the only reasonably effective means known today whereby the effectiveness of an enemy air attack may be reduced. No claim is made, however, that such a system is capable of thwarting an attack completely. It is impossible to achieve absolute security and there is no method whereby an impenetrable ring or barrier may be thrown up around the United States; the use of the phrase "radar fence" is misleading and unfortunate. Some of the hostile aircraft are bound to elude the interceptors and may reach their assigned targets. The problem is one of degree, the object being to exact such a toll of enemy aircraft that a hostile power will come to realize that his attrition rate is so high as to make continued attacks upon our vital centers not only unprofitable but a dangerous drain upon his own resources.

The foregoing, in essence, is what was accomplished in the Battle of Britain. The air defense forces of Britain did not win the war nor did they achieve the total destruction of the Luftwaffe. What they did accomplish, however, was to convince the German High Command that the continuance of their offensive would result in a disastrous drain upon their own economy. The Battle of Britain did not win the war against Germany; had it been lost, however, it is probable that Britain would have lost the war.

The air warning and control system to be established pursuant to the authority contained in this bill is considered to be so vital as a defensive measure in the interests of national security that specific authority is being sought, apart from the usual public-works program, for the construction of the necessary installations and facilities. A total construction program amounting to $85,500,000 is involved. This sum applies only to the cost of construction of buildings, facilities, utilities, and so forth, and does not include the acquisition cost of real estate nor the cost of radar and communications equipment. Neither does it include an item of $7,000,000 representing the cost of conversion to, and equipment of, four radar picket vessels which are to be provided by the Navy under the program. These four vessels are to be used to provide radar coverage over sea approaches in localities where the proximity of vital targets to the coast line precludes the deployment of land-based radar installations sufficiently far out to permit warning and interception of enemy planes in sufficient time. Funds for these vessels were requested but have been deleted from current budget estimates.

After several years of study a definite plan and program for the establishment of an aircraft warning and control system in the United States and Alaska has now been finalized by the Air Force and reviewed and approached by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense.

This program, which is considered to be the minimum acceptable from a military point of view, is believed to be economically feasible and will provide the United States with a modest degree of protection which would otherwise be wholly nonexistent.

It will require a considerable time to install, perfect, and make operational this system. This element of lead time is of the utmost importance and must be given serious consideration in order that the United States may be provided an adequate system of air defense within a reasonable length of time in the future. The achievement of an operational system in being requires more than the mere construction of buildings and physical facilities and equipment. More important still, it requires extensive training over a long period of time of large numbers of technical and operating personnel without whom such a system cannot possibly be operational.

The over-all cost of the construction to be authorized by this bill is estimated at $85,500,000; this figure does not include the cost of radar and communications equipment. New radar and communications equipment to be provided will cost an additional $26,000,000 which is not included in the authorization sought herein inasmuch as authority already exists for the procurement of equipment of this type. Existing radar equipment remaining in surplus from World War II and valued at $42,250,000 will also be allocated for use in the system.

The over-all cost of the entire program as planned includes the foregoing figures and, in addition, the previously mentioned item of $7,000,000 for four picket vessels, making an over-all total cost of about $161,000,000, exclusive of personnel costs. Deducting from this figure the value of existing radar and other equipment already bought and paid for, and deducting also the cost of the picket vessels inasmuch as funds for these have been deleted from current budget estimates, there remains the sum of about $112,000,000 for which new funds must be requested by the Air Force in order to complete the entire program. As already indicated, however, the fiscal effect of the authorization contained in this bill amounts only to $85,500,000.

The proposed program for air defense has been approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and by the Secretary of Defense. It is vigorously supported by the Army and Navy whose representatives have testified that the air-defense forces of these two services cannot be utilized to their maximum effectiveness except in conjunction with the system of land-based air warning and control installations which this bill would authorize.

The subcommittee unanimously recommends that the bill be favorably reported to the House with the following amendment: Page 2, following line 17, add a new section to read as follows——

The CHAIRMAN. Now, wait one moment, Mr. Durham. Let us read the bill, and we will get to the amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, that completes it. I may say there are a lot of questions in this that are classified.

The CHAIRMAN. How much is it estimated it will cost? Eighty-five million dollars?

Mr. DURHAM. For the construction to be authorized by this bill, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. No money is set up in the budget for it; this is merely an authorization?

Mr. DURHAM. The Bureau of the Budget interposes no objection. I don't believe that item is in the budget. Is that correct, Mr. Brown?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. Is there any agreement with the Government of Mexico?

Mr. DURHAM. Not as far as I know.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions of Mr. Durham from any members of the committee?

Mr. KILDAY. I would like to ask this, Mr. Chairman.

As I understood you, radar is effective only for 150 miles?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. Taking the present B–36, that would give you 30 minutes' warning, and with the development of the B–47's you would expect about a 15-minute warning, if its speed increases to somewhere in the neighborhood of 600 miles an hour.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. But, you see, Mr. Kilday——

Mr. KILDAY. I was wondering why the Bureau of the Budget eliminated these ships, which seem to me to be the most important part of it. If you are only going to have 15 minutes' warning you can put the ships out two or three hundred miles and have that much more warning.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think that can be worked out. These ships are already at the present time provided for. It is just a question of their putting this equipment that we already have on these picket vessels.

Mr. KILDAY. There would be adequate authority without this legislation to equip the picket vessels?

Mr. DURHAM. That is correct.

Mr. KILDAY. It seems to me the picket vessels are the most important part of the program.

Mr. SHORT. This $85,500,000 does not include the cost of radar equipment?

Mr. DURHAM. What is the question?

Mr. SHORT. The cost of radar equipment is not included?

Mr. DURHAM. We already have on hand about $42,000,000 worth of material that we are not using.

Of course, there are many things in this thing, especially as to the Alaskan set-up, that are rather confidential.

Mr. ARENDS. There has been no appreciable improvement in radar equipment since the war, so they could successfully use what they have on hand.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, let us read the bill.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, before we get to that I wonder if it shouldn't be made clear as to why no specific amount is mentioned in the authorization section, as was done in H. R. 1741. As it is, the Appropriations Committee has virtually unlimited authority to go ahead and appropriate whatever they see fit in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you think there should be put in the bill: "Not exceeding a total cost of $85,500,000."

Mr. ELSTON. Whatever the amount is.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the gentleman is correct. The Appropriations Committee could spend whatever they wanted to. Therefore, this committee loses control over the amount of the authorization

I imagine the reason why they didn't put it in there is due to the fact that they had not determined exactly how much would have to be asked for to install it. For that reason they were willing to leave it to the Appropriations Committee to develop the figures later.

I think probably we might hamstring it if we try to limit it in this bill to any particular amount. It may cost $85,000,000, and it may not cost $85,000,000. Or it may cost a great deal more. I think we might be on safer ground to let that go to the Appropriations Committee unless we are positive that it is not going to cost but a certain amount.

Mr. ELSTON. I am not objecting to it, but as a general policy I don't believe we should divest ourselves of authority—authorizing authority—and turn it over to the Appropriations Committee. We would really have nothing more to say about this program. It would be entirely up to the Appropriations Committee from now on.

The CHAIRMAN. But the report will show that we estimate the over-all cost at $85,000,000. So when anyone on the floor of the House

Digitized by Google

ks what it is going to cost, we can say that the information before now is that it would not be over $85,000,000, or whatever the ure was.

Mr. DURHAM. Eighty-five million.

Mr. BROWN. That is for construction. And that is all the bill thorizes, because the radar equipment is not covered since they ready have authority to buy that. Hence they do not need any thority in this bill to buy radar.

Mr. DURHAM. Now, there is no family housing in this. This is nstruction for operating units entirely.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Van Zandt.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Did the subcommittee get an estimate of the cost manning this equipment, maintaining it, and keeping it modernized?

Mr. DURHAM. The Air Force did not give us the exact cost of operaon.

Mr. BROWN. They gave us the annual cost of maintenance and eration, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DURHAM. We have the information as to how many men it kes to operate a unit like this. It is classified——

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I am principally concerned with the problem of odernization. Anyone who knows radar equipment knows how st it becomes obsolescent.

The CHAIRMAN. And for that very reason you better not put in ie bill any specific amount because there are constant changes.

Now, read the bill.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

H. R. 2546

BILL To authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations for the national security, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of merica in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Air Force is hereby uthorized to establish and develop within and without the continental limits f the United States in fulfilling the air defense responsibilities of the Department f the Air Force such land-based air warning and control installations and facilies, by the construction, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent ublic works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, utilities, and access oads, and to provide for necessary administration and planning therefor, without egard to sections 1136, 3648, 3734, Revised Statutes, as he may deem necessary n the interest of national security.

The CHAIRMAN. Any amendments to section 1?

All right, read section 2.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 2. In furtherance of the above, the Secretary of the Air Force is authorized o make surveys and to acquire lands and rights pertaining thereto or other interests therein, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, and to place permanent and temporary mprovements thereon whether such lands are held in fee or under lease, or under other temporary tenure.

The CHAIRMAN. Any amendments, Mr. Durham, to section 2?

Mr. DURHAM. No amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. BROWN (reading):

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, and when so specified in an appropriation Act such amounts shall remain available until expended.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. On page 2, following line 17, add a new section to read as follows:

SEC. 4. The provisions of this Act shall be subject to the duties and authority of the Secretary of Defense and the departments and agencies of the National Military Establishment as provided in the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress).

That is the same provision that is being placed in all of these bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is temporarily agreed to.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAVIN. Would this permit the installation of radar equipment at all our military installations now for GCA landings?

The CHAIRMAN. This would let the Administration put radar equipment where necessary.

Mr. GAVIN. I think it is very important.

The CHAIRMAN. It permits the Administration to put them wherever they think is necessary.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this involves GCA. This involves the detection of the approach of enemy aircraft.

The CHAIRMAN. It does this: It leaves the discretion in the hands of the military authorities as to where is the proper place to put the radar equipment. They have that discretion. They know where they contemplate putting these facilities.

Mr. JOHNSON. With due respect to your opinion, it seems to me the title doesn't include that—GCA landings—because it says: "to establish land-based air-warning and control installations."

Mr. NORBLAD. They have that authority now.

Mr. JOHNSON. Maybe they have that in some other law.

You could carve this whole fund away and not fulfill the purpose stated in this title if you installed GCA equipment under this bill.

Mr. ELSTON. GCA is already authorized, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I understood.

Mr. GAVIN. I would like to know where it is, because we only found it in one or two of the places we visited. And it certainly came in handy at the time.

Now, I am of the opinion that we ought to have GCA landings at all of our installations. I think it is very important. That is why I am bringing the question up here. What is the situation? Can anybody tell us whether the National Military Establishment is authorized——

Mr. SHORT. They have that power now.

Mr. GAVIN. They do?

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. DURHAM. They have that authority.

The CHAIRMAN. I am informed by Mr. Brown that GCA does not have any relation to this bill. I thought you had reference to the discretion in the hands of the military authorities as to the proper location of these air-warning and control facilities. Of course, they have the discretion to put the installations anywhere they see fit to put them.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I think I agree with the gentleman from Ohio about not leaving the bill as it is. We will never hear another thing about a warning system if the bill is passed as it is now.

Digitized by Google

The appropriations people will be the only people in Congress having anything to do with it. Their sessions will be executive. I do not like the idea of turning over blanket authority from this committee. We are charged with the establishment of the policy. And when you report out a bill here with no limitation on costs, we will never hear of it again. That will be the last we ever hear of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if you obtain an accurate figure, why, of course, it would be preferable to do so. But have we a sufficiently accurate figure available?

Mr. DURHAM. I do not see any objection to putting in a limitation here.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. How much?

Mr. DURHAM. We will have to get these figures correct.

Mr. BROWN. Well, the cost of the entire program is going to be approximately $161,000,000. However, about $42,000,000 of that is old radar equipment which we now have, and which has already been bought and paid for. That brings it down to about $119,000,000. Well, then, there is $7,000,000 for the Navy picket vessels, which is not included in the budget, and which the Navy would come in and ask for independently of the Air Force. That would not come under this authorization because this is an authorization for the Secretary of the Air Force. You take that out and that brings it down to $112,000,000.

Now, that $112,000,000 consists of the $85,500,000 for the construction of the buildings, facilities, utilities, and all that sort of thing, where this radar equipment is going to be installed. That is mainly what this bill is designed to authorize. It is for that necessary construction. The other part of the new item of $112,000,000 consists of about $26,000,000 for new radar and communications equipment. It is understood that the authority to purchase and procure that kind of equipment already exists independently of this bill.

The principal purpose of this bill being to authorize the construction, it might be safe to put in the figure of $85,500,000—or something slightly above that, to afford a margin of safety—unless it were construed that this bill should do more than authorize merely the construction.

The CHAIRMAN. Not exceeding $85,500,000 for construction. And that means not the equipment, but the establishment of the facilities.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If it were drafted along that line, and if it is the understanding of the committee that it does not include the radar equipment at all but merely includes construction of the necessary public works at these various places at a cost of not to exceed $85,500,000, why, of course, that is a far better way to legislate.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURHAM. Some of these stations are already in operation at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the bill being amended, by placing a top ceiling on the construction of these installations of not to exceed $85,500,000?

If not, then the clerk is instructed to prepare an amendment to that effect.

Now, are there any further questions of Mr. Durham?

Digitized by Google

If not, let the clerk call the roll. And all in favor of reporting the bill as amended vote "aye" and all opposed vote "no."

(Roll call.)

Mr. HARPER. Twenty-four "ayes" and no "nays."

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is unanimously reported by the Armed Services Committee. And I respectfully request Mr. Durham to file a resolution for a rule and notify Mr. Short. If Mr. Short is absent, notify Mr. Arends. If he is absent, notify Mr. Cole. Let us try to file the report today. And I suggest we try to have this bill up during the week beginning March 7. Make arrangements with the House leadership.

Now, have the hearings been printed?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were all sent to the members of the committee?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I wrote them all a letter about the bill and sent them a copy of the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Durham, anything else?

Mr. DURHAM. I will yield to Mr. Sasscer.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, Subcommittee No. 3 held hearings on H. R. 2663, which is a bill to provide for the administration of the Central Intelligence Agency, established pursuant to section 102, National Security Act of 1947, and for other purposes.

(H. R. 2663 is as follows:)

[H. R. 2663, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To provide for the administration of the Central Intelligence Agency, established pursuant to section 102, National Security Act of 1947, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

DEFINITIONS

SECTION 1. That when used in this Act, the term—

(a) "Agency" means the Central Intelligence Agency;

(b) "Director" means the Director of Central Intelligence;

(c) "Government agency" means any executive department, commission, council, independent establishment, corporation wholly or partly owned by the United States which is an instrumentality of the United States, board, bureau, division, service, office, officer, authority, administration, or other establishment, in the executive branch of the Government; and

(d) "Continental United States" means the States and the District of Columbia.

SEAL OF OFFICE

SEC. 2. The Director of Central Intelligence shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Central Intelligence Agency, of such design as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken thereof.

PROCUREMENT AUTHORITIES

SEC. 3. (a) In the performance of its functions the Central Intelligence Agency is authorized to exercise the authorities contained in sections 2 (c) (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), (10), (12), (15), (17), and sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 10 of the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947 (Public Law 413, Eightieth Congress, second session).

(b) In the exercise of the authorities granted in subsection (a) of this section, the term "Agency head" shall mean the Director, the Deputy Director, or the Executive of the Agency.

(c) The determinations and decisions provided in subsection (a) of this section to be made by the Agency head may be made with respect to individual purchases

Digitized by Google

contracts or with respect to classes of purchases or contracts, and shall be
l. Except as provided in subsection (d) of this section, the Agency head is horized to delegate his powers provided in this section, including the making uch determinations and decisions, in his discretion and subject to his direction, ny other officer or officers or officials of the Agency.
l) The power of the Agency head to make the determinations or decisions ified in paragraphs (12) and (15) of section 2 (c) and section 5 (a) of the ied Services Procurement Act of 1947 shall not be delegable. Each deteration or decision required by paragraphs (12) and (15) of section 2 (c), by ion 4 or by section 5 (a) of the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947, l be based upon written findings made by the official making such deter-ations, which findings shall be final and shall be available within the Agency a period of at least six years following the date of the determination.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING

EC. 4. (a) Any officer or employee of the Agency may be assigned or detailed special instruction, research or training, at or with domestic or foreign public rivate institutions; trade, labor, agricultural, or scientific associations; courses raining programs under the National Military Establishment; or commercial is.
b) The Agency shall, under such regulations as the Director may prescribe, the tuition and other expenses of officers and employees of the Agency assigned detailed in accordance with provisions of subsection (a) of this section, in lition to the pay and allowances to which such officers and employees may otherwise entitled.

TRAVEL, ALLOWANCES, AND RELATED EXPENSES

EC. 5. (a) Under such regulations as the Director may prescribe, the Agency, h respect to its officers and employees assigned to permanent-duty stations tside the continental United States, its territories, and possessions, shall—

(1) (A) pay the travel expenses of officers and employees of the Agency including expenses incurred while traveling pursuant to orders issued by the Director in accordance with the provisions of section 5 (a) (3) with regard to the granting of home leave;

(B) pay the travel expenses of members of the family of an officer or employee of the Agency when proceeding to or returning from his post of duty; accompanying him on authorized home leave; or otherwise traveling in accordance with authority granted pursuant to the terms of this or any other Act;

(C) pay the cost of transporting the furniture and household and personal effects of an officer or employee of the Agency to his successive posts of duty and, on the termination of his services, to his residence at time of appointment or to a point not more distant, or, upon retirement, to the place where he will reside;

(D) pay the cost of storing the furniture and household and personal effects of an officer or employee of the Agency who is absent under orders from his usual post of duty, or who is assigned to a post to which, because of emergency conditions, he cannot take or at which he is unable to use, his furniture and household and personal effects;

(E) pay the cost of storing the furniture and household and personal effects of an officer or employee of the Agency on first arrival at a post for a period not in excess of three months after such first arrival at such post or until the establishment of residence quarters, whichever shall be shorter;

(F) pay the travel expenses and transportation costs incident to the removal of the members of the family of an officer or employee of the Agency and his furniture and household and personal effects, including automobiles, from a post at which, because of the prevalence of disturbed conditions, there is imminent danger to life and property, and the return of such persons, furniture, and effects to such post upon the cessation of such conditions; or to such other post as may in the meantime have become the post to which such officer or employee has been assigned.

(2) Charge expenses in connection with travel of personnel, their dependents, and transportation of their household goods and personal effects, involving a change of permanent station, to the appropriation for the fiscal year current when any part of either the travel or transportation pertaining to the transfer begins pursuant to previously issued travel and transfer orders, notwithstanding the fact that such travel or transportation may not all be effected during such fiscal year, or the travel and transfer orders may have been issued during the prior fiscal year.

Digitized by Google

(3) Order to the continental United States on leave provided for in Fifth United States Code, 30, 30a, 30b, or as such sections may hereafter be amended, every officer and employee of the agency who was a resident of the United States at time of employment, upon completion of two years' continuous service abroad, or as soon as possible thereafter: Provided, That such officer or employee has accrued to his credit at the time of such order, annual leave sufficient to carry him in a pay status while in the United States for at least a thirty-day period.

(A) While in the continental United States on leave, the service of any officer or employee shall be available for work or duties in the agency or elsewhere, but the time of such work or duties shall not be counted as leave.

(B) Where an officer or employee on leave returns to the continental United States, leave of absence granted shall be exclusive of the time actually and necessarily occupied in going to and from the continental United States, and such time as may be necessarily occupied in awaiting transportation.

(4) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, transport for or on behalf of an officer or employee of the Agency, a privately owned automobile in any case where the Agency head shall determine that water, rail, or air transportation of the automobile is necessary or expedient for any part or of all the distance between points of origin and destination.

(5) (A) In the event of illness or injury requiring the hospitalization of an officer or employee of the Agency, not the result of vicious habits, intemperance, or misconduct on his part, incurred while on assignment abroad, in a locality where there does not exist a suitable hospital or clinic, pay the travel expenses of such officer or employee by whatever means he shall deem appropriate and without regard to the Standardized Government Travel Regulations and section 10 of the Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1516; 5 U. S. C. 73b), to the nearest locality where a suitable hospital or clinic exists and on his recovery pay for the travel expenses of his return to his post of duty. If the officer or employee is too ill to travel unattended, the Director may also pay the travel expenses of an attendant.

(B) Establish a first-aid station and provide for the services of a nurse at a post at which, in his opinion, sufficient personnel is employed to warrant such a station: Provided, That, in his opinion, it is not feasible to utilize an existing facility;

(C) In the event of illness or injury requiring hospitalization of an officer or employee of the Agency, not the result of vicious habits, intemperance, or misconduct on his part, incurred in the line of duty while such person is assigned abroad, pay for the cost of the treatment of such illness or injury at a suitable hospital or clinic;

(D) Provide for the periodic physical examination of officers and employees of the Agency and for the cost of administering inoculations or vaccinations to such officers or employees.

(6) Pay the cost of preparing and transporting the remains of an officer or employee of the Agency or a member of his family who may die while in travel status or abroad, to the home or official station, or to such other place as the Director may determine to be the appropriate place of interment, provided that in no case shall the expense payable be greater than the amount which would have been payable had the destination been the home or official station.

(7) Pay the costs of travel of new appointees and their dependents, and the transportation of their household goods and personal effects, from places of actual residence in foreign countries at time of appointment to places of employment and return to their actual residences at the time of appointment or a point not more distant: Provided, That such appointees agree in writing to remain with the United States Government for a period of not less than twelve months from the time of appointment.

Violation of this agreement for personal convenience of an employee or because of separation for misconduct will bar such return payments and, if determined by the Director or his designee to be in the best interests of the United States, any money expended by the United States on account of such travel and transportation shall be considered as a debt due by the individual concerned to the United States.

(b) In accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe and notwithstanding the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 70), the Director is authorized to grant to any officer or employee of the agency allowances in accordance with the provisions of section 901 (1) and 901 (2) of the Foreign Service Act of 1946.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES

SEC. 6. In the performance of its functions, the Central Intelligence Agency is authorized to—

(a) Transfer to and receive from other Government agencies such sums as may be approved by the Bureau of the Budget, for the performance of any of the functions or activities authorized under sections 102 and 303 of the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress), and any other Government agency is authorized to transfer to or receive from the Agency such sums without regard to any provisions of law limiting or prohibiting transfers between appropriations. Sums transferred to the Agency in accordance with this paragraph may be expended for the purposes and under the authority of this Act without regard to limitations of appropriations from which transferred;

(b) Exchange funds without regard to section 3651 Revised Statutes (31 U. S. C. 543);

(c) Reimburse other Government agencies for services of personnel assigned the Agency, and such other Government agencies are hereby authorized, without regard to provisions of law to the contrary, so to assign or detail any officer or ployee for duty with the Agency;

(d) Authorize couriers designated by the Director to carry firearms when gaged in transportation of confidential documents and materials affecting the tional defense and security;

(e) Make alterations, improvements, and repairs on premises rented by the ency, and pay rent therefor without regard to limitations on expenditures ntained in the Act of June 30, 1932, as amended: Provided, That in each case e Director shall certify that exception from such limitations is necessary to the ccessful performance of the Agency's functions or to the security of its activities.

(f) In the interests of the security of the foreign intelligence activities of the ited States and in order further to implement the proviso of section 102 (d)) of the National Security Act of 1947 (Public Law 253, Eightieth Congress, st session) that the Director of Central Intelligence shall be responsible for otecting intelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure, the ency shall be exempted from the provisions of sections 1 and 2, chapter 795 the Act of August 28, 1935 (49 Stat. 956, 957; 5 U. S. C. 654), and the provisions any other law which require the publication or disclosure of the organization, nctions, names, official titles, salaries, or numbers of personnel employed by e Agency: Provided, That in furtherance of this section, the Director of the ureau of the Budget shall make no reports to the Congress in connection with e Agency under section 607, title VI, chapter 212 of the Act of June 30, 1945, amended (5 U. S. C. 947 (b)).

(g) Whenever the Director and the Attorney General shall determine that the ntry of a particular alien into the United States for permanent residence is in e interest of national security or essential to the furtherance of the national telligence mission, such alien and his immediate family shall be given entry to the United States for permanent residence without regard to their inadmissiility under the immigration or any other laws and regulations, or to the failure comply with such laws and regulations: Provided, That the number of aliens nd members of their immediate families entering the United States under the uthority of this section shall in no case exceed one hundred in any one calendar ear.

(h) The Director is authorized to establish and fix the compensation for not nore than three positions in the professional and scientific field, within the gency, each such position being established to effectuate those scientific intelligence functions relating to national security, which require the services of specially ualified scientific or professional personnel: Provided, That the rates of compenation for positions established pursuant to the provisions of this section shall not e less than $10,330 per annum nor more than $15,000 per annum, and shall be ubject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 7. (a) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, sums made available to the Agency by appropriation or otherwise may be expended for purposes necessary to carry out its functions, including—

(1) personal services, including personal services without regard to limitations on types of persons to be employed, and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere; health-service program as authorized by law (5 U. S. C. 150); rental of news-reporting services; purchase of rental and operations of photographic, reproduction, cryptographic, duplication and printing machines, equipment and devices, and radio-receiving and radio-sending equipment and devices, including telegraph and teletype equipment; purchase, maintenance, operation, repair, and hire of passenger motor vehicles, and aircraft, and vessels of all kinds; subject to policies established by the Director, transportation of officers and employees of the Agency in Government-owned automotive equipment between their domiciles and places of employment where such personnel are engaged in work which makes such transportation necessary, and transportation in such equipment, to and from school, of children of Agency personnel who have quarters for themselves and their families at isolated stations outside the continental United States where adequate public or private transportation is not available; printing and binding; purchase, maintenance, and cleaning of firearms, including purchase, storage, and maintenance of ammunition; subject to policies established by the Director, expenses of travel in connection with, and expenses incident to attendance at meetings of professional, technical, scientific, and other similar organizations when such attendance would be a benefit in the conduct of the work of the Agency; association and library dues; payment of premiums or costs of surety bonds for officers or employees without regard to the provisions of Sixty-first Statutes, 646; Sixth United States Code 14 payment of claims pursuant to section 2672 of title 28, United States Code acquisition of necessary land and the clearing of such land; construction of buildings and facilities without regard to Thirty-sixth Statutes 699; Fortieth United States Code 259, 267; repair, rental, operation, and maintenance of buildings, utilities, facilities, and appurtenances; and

(2) supplies, equipment, and personnel and contractual services otherwise authorized by law and regulations, when approved by the Director.

(b) The sums made available to the Agency may be expended without regard to the provisions of law and regulations relating to the expenditure of Government funds; and for objects of a confidential, extraordinary, or emergency nature, such expenditures to be accounted for solely on the certificate of the Director and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the amount therein certified.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 8. If any provision of this Act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of this Act or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 9. This Act may be cited as the "Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949".

Mr. SASSCER. Briefly, Mr. Chairman, this bill is substantially the same as a bill that was reported by this committee in the last Congress and passed the Senate in the closing days of the last Congress.

As the title implies, it relates to procurement authority and the method of expenditure of funds for travel of the agency. It primarily legalizes and outlines the functions of the agency, which has been operating for sometime under a few lines in the National Security Act of 1947.

I have a prepared statement here that we can go over, and I will be glad to attempt to answer any questions the committee cares to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the same bill that the committee had a very exhaustive hearing on in the last session, during the Eightieth Congress, when our distinguished colleague, Mr. Shafer, had charge of the bill. I sat in on practically all of the hearings and am somewhat familiar with this bill, and the purposes and objectives of it. And the committee in the last session unanimously reported the bill out, and as the gentlemen from Maryland, Mr. Sasscer, has said it passed the Senate but it was caught in the jam during the last days of the Eightieth Congress and we were unable to get it up.

Now, of course, we all recognize the purpose of this bill. Of course, there is a great deal of matter that we cannot discuss here, and we cannot discuss on the floor of the House. We will just have to tell the House they will have to accept our judgment and we cannot answer a great many questions that might be asked. We cannot have a Central Intelligence Agency if you are going to advertise it and all of its operations from the tower—what is the big building in New York?

Mr. SHORT. The Empire State——

The CHAIRMAN. The Empire State Building. So the Congress just has to go along or else not have any confidence in us.

Mr. SHORT. I think most of us will agree, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the weakest link in our whole chain of national defense in the past has been the lack of a Central Intelligence Agency. I think there is nothing more important.

The CHAIRMAN. You are absolutely right.

Mr. SHORT. We have to build it up.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, are there any amendments you are offering?

Mr. SASSCER. I will be glad to attempt to answer questions before we get to amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. I was under the impression that this was passed at the last Congress, but the question of 100 aliens is involved.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RIVERS. What is that?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the provisions of this bill we permit 100 aliens to come into this country that might be barred by other statutes, but we will just have to——

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to read that paragraph of the statement, if you care to, relating to the aliens.

The CHAIRMAN. That probably will be the only thing that the House will want to know a great deal about.

Mr. SASSCER. Before reading that, for the information of the committee, the high spots——

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you this: Do you prefer to discuss it in executive session?

Mr. KILDAY. I would ask that you discuss it——

The CHAIRMAN. We have to discuss it on the floor of the House, and that is not in executive session. We will have to recognize the fact that it has to be debated if the House wants it debated.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, if we should get to some point where we would want to go into executive session we might think of the words of the great American that used to serve on this committee: Ewing Thomason—"You have to trust somebody."

Mr. SASSCER. What I have to say I think I can say in open session. For the information of the committee, I will give you the high spots of the legislation. It deals with certain authorities, as well as travel, allowances, and related expenses for the agency personnel. Apparently up to now, that has been done without legal authority. For an agency that is as important as this Agency, naturally it is quite necessary that the functions be outlined and legislative authority to be given for the various services that they are called upon to perform.

It permits travel and allowances, on which there has been some question, which is allowed to similar citizens of the United States employed in the State Department and other agencies.

It permits the Agency to move employees and their families from zones and places where because of changed or disturbed conditions it may be dangerous for them to stay.

There is a provision in existing law that prevents any agency from spending a sum in excess of 25 percent of the rent on leased property in a given year. The testimony before the committee developed that, very frequently, due to the confidential nature or the necessity of preserving the secrecy of their functions, it may be necessary to spend more than 25 percent of the annual rent.

The bill permits the Agency to employ several scientists and fixes the pay range for those persons so employed.

In substance, as I outlined a moment ago, it is more or less outlining administrative procedure.

The committee was somewhat interested to know whether or not there would be overlap of authority or conflict between the State Department Intelligence Section and the intelligence section of the services. It developed in the committee that their functions were in different fields; and, although the information sometimes crossed, it is taken care of in a procedure somewhat similar to our Joint Chiefs of Staff, where the heads of the various departments keep in close liaison with each other and interchange information. And all of it has to be cleared through the Central Intelligence Agency.

Getting back to the 100 aliens each year, I will now read from the statement: [Reading.]

> Section 6 (g) has been renumbered section 8. This important feature of the proposed legislation provides that whenever the director and the Attorney General determine that the entry of an alien for permanent residence in the United States is essential to the furtherance of the national intelligence mission such alien and his immediate family shall be given entry into the United States without regard to such admissibility under existing laws and regulations.

The section limits this authority to 100 persons in any one year.

I call to the committee's attention that this is 100 persons, and not 100 families. And we have the additional check of having them approved by the Attorney General as well as the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, for them to come in.

The purpose of this section is quite obvious. Its enactment will permit the Director of the Agency, acting jointly with the Attorney General, to admit into this country aliens whose intelligence potential has proven of the highest value to the national security.

The subcommittee considered this provision carefully and it felt that the purpose for which this section was drafted is of sufficient importance to the national intelligence mission to justify the granting of this unusual authority.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Digitized by Google

Mr. SASSCER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. I noticed the other day they brought in those two Russians. Don't they have authority to bring them in anyway?

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to go into executive session on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee go into executive session.

(Whereupon, the committee went into executive session, and off the record.)

AUTHORIZING THE APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS ON THE ACTIVE LIST OF THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS IN THE REGULAR ARMY, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 3344). MR. RIVERS

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, March 2, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Secretary of the Army recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To authorize the appointment of officers on the active list of the Philippine Scouts in the Regular Army, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Army.

Sincerely yours.,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith a draft of a bill to authorize the appointment of officers on the active list of the Philippine Scouts in the Regular Army, and for other purposes, which the Department of the Army recommends be enacted into law. The Secretary of Defense has assigned responsibility for the preparation and submission of this measure, on behalf of the National Military Establishment, to this Department.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to integrate certain officers of the Philippine Scouts into the Regular Army. This legislation becomes necessary due to planned action affecting the status of the Philippine Scouts.

There are about 11 officers of the Philippine Scouts who are United States citizens, commissioned prior to World War II. These officers are paid, promoted, accrue retirement rights, and are administered in all respects the same as Regular Army officers. They are professional officers to the same extent as Regular Army officers; but they are not, in fact, Regular Army officers. At present, all of these officers have retirement equities varying from about 14 to 30 years. Many of them have several years of useful service ahead of them. The best interests of the service and of the individuals will be served by taking this action to integrate them into the Regular Army.

Inasmuch as the officers to be appointed under this proposed legislation will be within the authorized strength of the Army, and in view of the fact that they are now paid by the Army, the fiscal effects of this legislation will be negligible.

This report has been coordinated among the Departments in the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Bureau of the Budget has been consulted and advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

KENNETH C. ROYALL,
Secretary of the Army.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to romote the national defense by authorizing a unitary plan for construction of transsonic and supersonic wind-tunnel facilities and the stablishment of an air engineering development center, which the ational Advisory Committee for Aeronautics and the National Military Establishment recommend be enacted into law.

Title I of the proposed legislation concerns the unitary plan for the onstruction of transsonic and supersonic wind-tunnel facilities. The urpose of this title is summarized in the attached copy of a letter, ated April 26, 1948, addressed to the Director, Bureau of the Budget, nd signed jointly by the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the ational Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (enclosure 1).

The purpose of title II is to confer upon the Secretary of the Air orce authority to establish an air engineering development center and o provide and operate facilities for conducting research and development, including the construction and operation of wind tunnels in nplementation of the unitary plan referred to in title I, and for the evelopment and testing of matériel and equipment contributing to he effectiveness of the Air Force. The need for this authority is set orth in attached enclosure 2.

The fiscal effect of the proposed legislation is reflected in the nclosed draft of the bill.

This proposed legislation has been coordinated with the Departments of the Army and the Navy and the Research and Development Board in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense for the coordination of such matters within the National Military Establishment.

Insofar as the future handling of this proposed legislation on behalf of the National Military Establishment is concerned, the Secretary of Defense has delegated this responsibility to the Department of the Air Force.

Enclosure 1: Joint letter from Secretary of Defense and chairman, NACA, dated April 26, 1948.

ENCLOSURE 1

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1948.

Subject: Legislation to promote the national defense by authorizing the construction of supersonic wind-tunnel facilities.

THE DIRECTOR, THE BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Executive Office of the President, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There is transmitted herewith draft of proposed legislation to promote the national defense by authorizing the first steps of the unitary plan of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics and of the National Military Establishment for the construction of supersonic wind-tunnel facilities, including facilities for training and research at universities.

The enclosed draft would initiate the program of additional supersonic facilities for which the President made provision in his budget message of January 6, 1948 (pp. M44, M45, M57). It is also the legislation referred to in NACA letters of March 10, 1948, to the Assistant Director, Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget, as being required by the NACA and the National Military Establishment for carrying out portions of the programs approved by those agencies.

The relation of the part transmitted to the whole plan, and the means of coordination, are as follows:

THE UNITARY PLAN

In 1945 the military services and the NACA studied the effect of supersonic flight on the research, development, and evaluation effort required to insure leadership of the United States in the evolution of aircraft and missiles in this new speed range. The conclusions arrived at, particularly those of the NACA, the Air Force, and the guided missiles committee of the Joint Chiefs of Staff concerning wind-tunnel requirements, were available at the April 1946 meeting of the NACA where it was agreed that the recommendations of all agencies should be obtained, reconciled, and coordinated to eliminate any duplication and nonessential items, and to evolve a unitary wind-tunnel plan.

The desired coordination was effected by special panels of the NACA studying the questions in the period April 1946 to January 1947. The resulting unitary plan was approved by NACA on January 24, 1947, and was forwarded to the Joint Research and Development Board for approval of the heads of the armed services. The plan aimed at the foreseeable needs of the country in the next 10 years; it recommended allocation and operating responsibilities among the NACA, Air Force, Navy, and universities for an integrated wind-tunnel program with an estimated cost of approximately $1,100,000,000, exclusive of electric-generating and transmission facilities and personnel housing that may be required. These wind tunnels will be available for use of all interested agencies.

JUSTIFICATION

The justification for the unitary plan is a principal part of the proceedings of formulation, coordination, and review of the whole program, and therefore comprises a considerable volume of material. A digest of the principal points of justification follows:

1. The development of air war and of atomic weapons has made the air our first line of defense.

Digitized by Google

2. The maintenance of technical supremacy in the air is essential to our national ense.
3. Speed is the most important single characteristic of military aircraft.
4. The way is open for any country to attain technical supremacy in super- ic airplanes and missiles if it is willing and able to make the effort necessary olve the problems of supersonic flight.
5. Major problems of supersonic flight are: High thrust with low fuel consump- to attain maximum speed and range, stability and control at supersonic eds, stability and control at subsonic and transonic speeds, optimum configura- s for maximum performance, automatic piloting, and aerodynamic heating.
6. An adequate program for solving these problems should provide for the ining of technical personnel, for research, and for the development and evalua- of new designs.
7. Long experience with the solution of subsonic problems and recent experience h the solution of supersonic problems provide an adequate basis for the de- mination of means for attacking the new problems and for implementing an quate program.
8. Wind tunnels provide the best means for attacking these problems. Wind nels are required tools for training, for research, and for development and luation.
9. Supersonic wind tunnels to meet the needs of these problems must satisfy hnical requirements of size, speed, air density, air temperature, air supply, aust disposal, and auxiliary equipment.
10. The technical requirements result in every case in facilities of considerable wer and cost; in some cases of great power and large cost.
11. The power and cost factors require all needs to be fully integrated so that parts of the program and all participating organizations are served with a imum number of facilities operated for maximum utilization.
12. This integration has been accomplished in the preparation of the unitary ind-tunnel program.
13. Time is an irrecoverable asset in attaining technical supremacy in the air. echnical strength in time of emergency is the sum total of advances made prior the emergency.
14. The sequence of technical effort leading to successful military airplanes id missiles is such as to require the initiation of facilities as much as 10 to 15 ars in advance of the need for weapons.
15. The United States should act now to realize the potentialities of supersonic rplanes and missiles in the national defense.

The need for this program has also been recognized by the President's Air olicy Commission and by the Congressional Aviation Policy Board.

The President's Air Policy Commission in its report of January 1, 1948 (pp. 3-94), concludes that the United States is dangerously short of equipment for search in the transonic and supersonic speed ranges and recommends "that we roceed without delay in supplementing existing laboratory equipment with the ew tunnels projected under the unitary plan in whatever order of priority and at hatever rate as will be recommended by the Research and Development Board."

The Congressional Aviation Policy Board in its report of March 1, 1948 (sec. 71, p. 14), urges the provision of adequate research and development facilities since hey are essential for continued United States aviation leadership, and recom- ends that a unified plan for transonic and supersonic research and development acilities be expedited.

ACTION OF RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT BOARD

The Research and Development Board has studied the unitary plan with a view o arranging the program and time schedule to stress those facilities agreed to be ssential and urgently required at the present time. Such a program might be arried out with appropriations extending over 5 years. This study is still under- ay, but the RDB, in order to expedite the final approval of certain facilities hat do not require the establishment of new stations, recommended that portion f the plan urgently needed for training research workers in the supersonic field, nd for research and development work, be forwarded for authorization and ap- ropriation.

The plan falls naturally into parts that are consistent with the relative urgency nd with the physical problems. The training function and the development unction are in serious need of wind-tunnel facilities; the training function can be atisfied and the development need can be met in part by placing facilities at xisting laboratories. Larger facilities of the plan are still under consideration; heir problems are more complex in that they require establishment of new sta-

The plan falls naturally into parts that are consistent with the relative urgency and with the physical problems. The training function and the development function are in serious need of wind-tunnel facilities; the training function can be satisfied and the development need can be met in part by placing facilities at existing laboratories. Larger facilities of the plan are still under consideration; their problems are more complex in that they require establishment of new stations and very large amounts of electric power. Due to the urgency of the entire unitary plan and in consideration of the time factor involved in the construction of supersonic wind tunnels, it was deemed unwise to delay submission of the initial phase pending final agreement on the remainder of the plan. It is anticipated that remaining parts of the unitary plan will be forwarded to the Bureau of the Budget when approved.

INITIAL PHASE OF THE UNITARY PLAN

The initial phase of the unitary plan includes thirteen wind tunnels for university training and research, three 2-foot wind tunnels for research and development to be located at NACA Ames laboratory, NACA Langley laboratory, and Navy David W. Taylor model basin, respectively; two 4-foot tunnels for research and development to be located at NACA Ames and Langley laboratories, and necessary service facilities; at a total estimated cost of $77,000,000. The wind tunnels at Government stations will be equally available to the NACA, and to the military services and their industrial contractors for development purposes.

RECOMMENDATION

The Secretary of Defense and the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics concur in the need for the facilities proposed in the initial phase of the unitary plan. Legislative authorization is required for implementing certain aspects of this initial phase. We join in recommending approval of the enclosed draft of legislation required to accomplish this purpose. We feel that the urgency and importance of the plan justify expeditious action in the national interest.

TO PROMOTE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE BY AUTHORIZING A UNITARY PLAN FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRANSSONIC AND SUPERSONIC WIND-TUNNEL FACILITIES AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN AIR ENGINEERING DEVELOPMENT CENTER (H. R. 3434). BY MR. VINSON

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE
FOR AERONAUTICS,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to promote the national defense by authorizing a unitary plan for construction of transsonic and supersonic wind-tunnel facilities and the establishment of an air engineering development center, which the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics and the National Military Establishment recommend be enacted into law.

Title I of the proposed legislation concerns the unitary plan for the construction of transsonic and supersonic wind-tunnel facilities. The purpose of this title is summarized in the attached copy of a letter, dated April 26, 1948, addressed to the Director, Bureau of the Budget, and signed jointly by the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (enclosure 1).

The purpose of title II is to confer upon the Secretary of the Air Force authority to establish an air engineering development center and to provide and operate facilities for conducting research and development, including the construction and operation of wind tunnels in implementation of the unitary plan referred to in title I, and for the development and testing of matériel and equipment contributing to the effectiveness of the Air Force. The need for this authority is set forth in attached enclosure 2.

The fiscal effect of the proposed legislation is reflected in the enclosed draft of the bill.

This proposed legislation has been coordinated with the Departments of the Army and the Navy and the Research and Development Board in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense for the coordination of such matters within the National Military Establishment.

Insofar as the future handling of this proposed legislation on behalf of the National Military Establishment is concerned, the Secretary of Defense has delegated this responsibility to the Department of the Air Force.

ENCLOSURE 2

TITLE II OF PROPOSED BILL TO PROMOTE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE BY AUTHORIZING A UNITARY PLAN FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRANSONIC AND SUPERSONIC WIND TUNNEL FACILITIES AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN AIR ENGINEERING DEVELOPMENT CENTER

The purpose of title II of the proposed legislation is to authorize the Secretary of the Air Force to establish a new Air Engineering Development Center in order to assure the modernization and continued aggressive development of military aircraft and air weapons, particularly in the newly opened and unexplored field of supersonic flight.

In 1945 it became apparent that the new requirements of jet-propelled aircraft and supersonic flight were rapidly making existing test facilities obsolete. For this reason an intensive study of new facility requirements was made by the Air Force leading to the proposal for an Air Engineering Development Center. The unusual magnitude of power and water requirements of the newer types of facilities makes it necessary to establish the new center in a location where large power and water potentials exist.

The proposed Air Engineering Development Center has undergone a process of detailed coordination since early 1945 with the other military services and interested agencies to avoid duplication and to insure an integrated effort on a national scale. As an example of this, the wind tunnels of the Air Engineering Development Center form a part of the so-called unitary plan or "National Program of Transonic and Supersonic Wind Tunnels" formulated by a special panel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

The Research and Development Board has carefully reviewed and approved the establishment of an Air Engineering Development Center as necessary for the proper implementation of the national military research and development program.

The fiscal effects of title II of this bill are reflected therein and are also indicated by the fact that the initial cost of establishing a new center and providing the facilities approved by the Research and Development Board is estimated at approximately $50,000,000 during fiscal year 1950.

FULL COMMITTEE HEARINGS ON S. 278 AND S. 629

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEES

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Tuesday, March 15, 1949.

The committee met at 10:30 o'clock, a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Kilday, do you want to take your bill for a half hour or do you want to go over until tomorrow?

Mr. KILDAY. I understand there are some reports from the subcommittees to the full committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. KILDAY. They will probably take up the remaining time.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

First, I appointed Mr. Brooks and Mr. Short to draft a resolution reference to the passing of our former distinguished chairman, Mr. Andrews. I think they have prepared such a resolution and I call Mr. Brooks to bring that up now.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, the committee met and drafted a solution, which I will ask the clerk to read to the committee.

Mr. HARPER (reading):

RESOLUTION—WALTER GRESHAM ANDREWS

The Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives has heard, h profound sorrow and deep regret, of the sudden death of our late and lanted friend, the former able and distinguished chairman of our committee, the norable Walter Gresham Andrews.

Those of us who had served with him for many years on our committee admired, pected, and loved Mr. Andrews because of the man he was.

He was truly a great American who served his country well in war and in peace. ter serving on the Mexican border, he commanded a company of expert machinenners in France in World War I. Gallant in action, he was wounded and was arded the Distinguished Service Cross. Returning to the country he loved, ran, and was elected, to Congress from the district in Buffalo, N. Y., and served re with distinction and honor for 18 years.

Not fully understood at times as to his motives, he succeeded in molding the o old Committees of Military and Naval Affairs into the Armed Services Comttee, which few men could have accomplished.

Always he was eminently fair, considerate, and helpful to the members of our mmittee, and we shall always remember him with deep and abiding gratitude r the service that he rendered to his country.

"Ham" Andrews—as we affectionately called him and as he liked to be called—as a vigorous, unselfish, and great, patriotic American.

Members of the Committee on the Armed Services wish the world to know that held him in the highest esteem and with fond affection, and we wish to extend his bereaved sister, Mrs. William P. Urban, and other kin, our sincere symathy in this hour of sorrow and irreparable loss.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will prepare the letter necessary to send ie resolution to his sister.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I will ask Mr. Kilday to give a report of his subcommittee on Senate bill 278.

(The bill referred to is as follows:)

[S. 278, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

AN ACT To prevent retroactive checkage of payments erroneously made to certain retired officers of the Naval Reserve, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the term "Reserve components" as used in section 6 of the Act approved February 21, 1946 (60 Stat. 27; 34 U. S. C. 410b) shall include officers on the honorary retired list of the Naval Reserve or Marine Corps Reserve established by section 309 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938, as amended (34 U. S. C. 855h).

SEC. 2. This Act shall be effective from February 21, 1946.

Passed the Senate February 8, 1949.

Attest:

LESLIE L. BIFFLE, Secretary.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the proposed legislation as amended, is threefold. First, it will remove what the committee considers to be an unjustifiable checkage of retired pay of four officers who served in World War II and who had met all of the requirements for retirement with pay under the provisions of Public Law 305 Seventy-ninth Congress.

Second, it will enable the Department of the Navy to compute the retired pay of five other Reserve officers who served in World War II who had previously been placed on the honorary retired list with pay and who, under the provisions of Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress, were considered to be eligible for increased retired pay because of increased active service.

Third, as amended, the proposed legislation will remove any doubt as to the eligibility of persons heretofore or hereafter placed on the honorary retired list of the Naval or Marine Corps Reserve without pay to be retired if otherwise qualified under the provisions of title II of Public Law 810, Eightieth Congress.

Since the Naval Reserve Act of 1938 (34 U. S. C. 855h), the Navy and Marine Corps have maintained an honorary retired list for Reserve officers of the Navy and Marine Corps. Such personnel may be placed on the honorary retired list of the Naval and Marine Corps Reserve in recognition of long and honorable service as members of the Reserve components. The vast majority of the persons on the honorary list are retired without pay. However, under the 1938 act if a Reserve officer or enlisted man completes 30 years of active Federal service, he may be placed on the honorary retired list and draw pay computed at 50 percent of his base and longevity pay. In addition, officers and enlisted personnel with 20 years of active Federal service of which 10 of the last 11 years were continuous active duty are also eligible to be retired at 50 percent of their base and longevity pay.

At the outbreak of World War II, all personnel on the honorary retired list who were physically fit were recalled to active duty and served with distinction. In 1946 Congress passed Public Law 305, Seventy-ninth Congress, authorizing retirement of all Navy and Marine Corps officers, Reserves and Regulars alike, with 20 or more years of active Federal service at least 10 of which were active commissioned service, computed at 2½ percent times the number of years of active Federal service times the base and longevity pay of the hight rank satisfactorily held during World War II. After the passage this act five officers who had been on the honorary retired list of e Naval Reserve were found to have had, as a result of their active ity during World War II, a total of 20 or more years of active Fedal service and were, therefore, retired by the Navy under the proions of Public Law 305. Approximately 1 year after these five icers had commenced to receive retired pay under Public Law 305, e Comptroller General in his decision of May 6, 1947, held that ese officers having once been retired to the honorary retired list re not eligible to be re-retired under the provisions of Public Law 5. He accordingly held that their retired pay should be terminated d further directed that these officers repay to the Government the ount of retired pay which they had already received.

As a result of this decision the Navy Department ceased paying ired pay to these officers; but permission was obtained from the mptroller General to withhold the retroactive checkage of pay in eyance until such time as the Congress had had an opportunity consider the necessary remedial legislation. Since the date of e Comptroller General's decision, one of the Reserve officers ncerned has died.

Passage of the proposed legislation will enable the Department of e Navy to resume payments to the surviving retired officers and also pay these officers or their estates the amount of money that has en withheld from them since the Comptroller General's decision.

In addition, passage of the proposed legislation will enable the epartment of the Navy to compute the retired pay of five other serve officers retired on the honorary retired list of the Naval serve who have heretofore received a flat 50 percent over their se and longevity pay under the Naval Reserve Act of 1938. Such omputation will be based upon their actual number of years of tive duty including those years served on recall to active duty since irement to the honorary retired list, and in the same manner now plicable to all other officers retired based on length of service.

The committee took cognizance of the further fact that such Reserve ficers and enlisted personnel now on the honorary retired lists the Navy and Marine Corps Reserve might be adversely affected a pending Comptroller General's decision with respect to the posle retirement of such personnel under the provisions of title III Public Law 810. On the basis of the Comptroller General's decin that officers once retired to the honorary retired list may not er again be re-retired under any other provision of law, it is assumed at the Comptroller General may very well rule that such personnel ho may otherwise be qualified would not be eligible for the retirent benefits of Title III of Public Law 810. Therefore, the committe amended the proposed measure to insure that such officers and nlisted personnel will not be precluded from the benefits of title III Public Law 810 merely because of their having been retired to the norary retired list of the Navy and Marine Corps Reserve without ty.

There is no comparable situation in any other branch of the armed rvices. Passage of the proposed legislation will not require the bligation of any new funds in view of the fact that these payments ave been provided for in past appropriations and in the 1950 budget.

The bill was unanimously approved by the committee.

Mr. Chairman, with the amendment offered by the subcommittee, I move the favorable report of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the favorable report of the bill as amended? If not, the bill, as amended, will be favorably reported.

Mr. Durham, is there a report from your subcommittee?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes; on S. 629,

(The bill referred to is as follows:)

[S. 629, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

AN ACT To authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property comin into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of th Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States o America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretar of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force respectively, are hereby authorized to dispose of by sale or otherwise, one yea after date of receipt, all lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property which now or may hereafter come into the possession, custody, or control of the Treasur Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or th Department of the Air Force, as the case may be: Provided, That an effort sha be made to determine and locate the owner or owners thereof, or their leg representatives, and that in all cases where the owner thereof, or legal represent tive, has been determined the property shall not be sold or otherwise disposed o for a period of ninety days after written notice has been sent to his last know address.

SEC. 2. The net proceeds received from the sale of any such property by th Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of th Navy, or the Department of the Air Force shall be covered into the Treasury a miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 3. Claims for the net proceeds, if any, of such property so disposed of ma be filed with the General Accounting Office by the rightful owners or their leg representatives at any time prior to the expiration of three years from the date o the disposal of the property and, if not so filed, are barred from being acted on b either courts or the accounting officers.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretar of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, respectively, are authorized t prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purpos and provisions of this Act.

SEC. 5. Any property coming within the provisions of this Act which may b delivered to the Soldier's Home under regulations prescribed by the Secretary o the Army or the Secretary of the Air Force shall be limited to papers of valu sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, or oth articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes.

SEC. 6. This Act shall not be construed as amending or repealing the Act o March 29, 1918 (40 Stat. 499); article 112 of section 1, chapter 11, of the Act o June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 809); the Act of February 21, 1931 (46 Stat. 1203); the Ac of December 28, 1945 (59 Stat. 662), as amended; or the Act of August 2, 194 (60 Stat. 846–847), as amended.

Passed the Senate February 8, 1949.

Attest:

LESLIE L. BIFFLE, Secretary.

This bill is necessitated by the fact that there is a considerabl volume of personal property which has become lost, abandoned, or i unclaimed, and which has been brought back from overseas, now in th possession of the services, the owners of which cannot be located an yet no means is available by which to dispose of the property in a orderly manner. It is requiring quite a number of personnel to loo after this lost, abandoned, and unclaimed property.

Digitized by Google

The committee has rewritten the Senate bill because of the fact that it was not very clear as to some of the disposal procedures, which carries with it, in effect, the authority to sell this property and the funds go back to the Treasury Department.

Mr. SHORT. The general fund?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes; miscellaneous receipts. The small trinkets and things like that that have been brought back have been brought back because the services have not been able to locate the owners over the past 3 years. Trinkets and keepsakes and personal things go to the Soldiers' Home, and the rightful owners, if located, have a right to recover that in the next 2 years and also, if anything is sold, they have a right to recover the funds obtained from its sale, if they can establish ownership.

That, Mr. Chairman, covers the bill, which was unanimously approved by the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions in regard to the provisions of Senate bill 629?

Mr. SASSCER. This, I understand, Mr. Chairman, is simply property of individuals and no Government property is involved at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Who are the individuals that are involved—civilians?

Mr. DURHAM. They are probably civilians now. It is property of people shipped back from ports.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the pleasure of the committee with reference to this bill?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Does this represent any confiscated equipment brought back by Army personnel?

Mr. DURHAM. No; it is personal and service equipment lost or abandoned.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be approved by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amended bill will be agreed to and Mr. Durham will report the bill.

Now, members of the committee, I want to thank each one of you for your attendance on the subcommittees. I am much gratified to know that nearly every day every man who is on a subcommittee has been present at its meetings and it is quite beneficial to the work of the full committee.

Tomorrow morning, Mr. Durham's subcommittee will meet in the large caucus room to take up the subject matter of armories.

Tomorrow, Mr. Brooks will meet with his subcommittee No. 1 to continue the hearing on the military-justice bill.

Mr. Kilday's subcommittee No. 2 will meet here to continue with the pay bill.

The plan tomorrow is, after we dispose of the rent-control bill in the House, to bring in the rule to take up the composition bill for which 4 hours' general debate has been granted. I hope every member of the committee will be in attendance on the floor of the House tomorrow and I trust you will take part in the debate, as we have 4 hours of debate that should be worth while.

It is a quarter to 11 now. It is a little late to take up Mr. Kilday's pay bill, and I suggest we take a recess.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, before we take a recess, I want to bring up the discussion we had in reference to the appointment of a special subcommittee to investigate the reason why the Reserve programs have bogged down so badly.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I will be glad to discuss that with you and Mr. Short and the policy committee and we will try to reach some decision about it in the next 2 or 3 days.

Mr. ANDERSON. Fine.

The CHAIRMAN. Members of the committee, I know of nothing further for us to do this morning, but I want to make this statement before we recess.

Mr. Forrestal retires at the end of this month. On the 29th, a week from Tuesday, I am asking Mr. Forrestal to appear before the committee, as we want him up here before he officially retires.

That is all this morning. We will adjourn and the subcommittees will go to work tomorrow and we will take a recess until next week.

(Whereupon, at 10:40 a. m., the committee adjourned.)

[No. 30]

TO REPEAL THAT PART OF SECTION 3 OF THE ACT OF JUNE 24, 1926 (44 STAT. 767), AS AMENDED, AND THAT PART OF SECTION 13a OF THE ACT OF JUNE 3, 1916 (39 STAT. 166), AS AMENDED, RELATING TO THE PERCENTAGE, IN TIME OF PEACE, OF ENLISTED PERSONNEL EMPLOYED IN AVIATION TACTICAL UNITS OF THE NAVY, MARINE CORPS, AND AIR CORPS, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 3712). MR. VINSON

THE SECRETATY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, March 11, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Navy recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To repeal that part of section 3 of the Act of June 24, 1926 (44 Stat. 767), as amended, and that part of section 13a of the Act of June 3, 1916 (39 Stat. 166), as amended, relating to the percentage, in time of peace, of enlisted personnel employed in aviation tactical units of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Corps, and for other purposes".

This legislation has been approved by me for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the Establishment has been placed in the Department of the Navy.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, March 3, 1949.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to repeal that part of section 3 of the act of June 24, 1926 (44 Stat. 767), as amended, and that part of section 13a of the act of June 3, 1916 (39 Stat. 166), as amended, relating to the percentage, in time of peace, of enlisted personnel employed in aviation tactical units of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Corps, and for other purposes.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to repeal paragraph 8 of section 3 of the act of June 24, 1926, which provides that, in time of peace, not less than 20 percent of the total number of pilots employed in aviation tactical units of the Navy and Marine Corps shall be enlisted men, except when the Secretary of the Navy shall determine that it is impracticable to secure that number of enlisted pilots. A similar provision of law, relating to the number of enlisted pilots in the Air Corps, would also be repealed. The proposed bill further provides that the status of enlisted personnel designated as aviation pilots or engaged in training leading to the designation as aviation pilot shall not be changed.

The provision of law which would be repealed by the proposed bill and which provides for the number of enlisted pilots in the Navy and Marine Corps has been rendered impracticable of accomplishment by the enactment of Public Law 729,

Digitized by Google

Seventy-ninth Congress, approved August 13, 1946, which provides for the training of officers for the naval service. One of the provisions of that act relates to the naval aviation college program which provides for flight training of enlisted men. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized under that act to enroll the following in the training program as naval aviation officer candidates:

(1) any high-school graduate or person of equivalent educational level;

(2) any person who has completed satisfactorily less than two scholastic years' work in an accredited college or university;

(3) any member of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps who has satisfactorily completed two scholastic years' work in an accredited college or university;

(4) any enlisted man of the Navy or Marine Corps who demonstrates by a test the attainment of an educational level equivalent to that of two scholastic years' work in an accredited college or university.

The candidates in groups (1) and (2) in the preceding paragraph are enlisted as seamen recruits, United States Naval Reserve, and are required to attend an accredited college or university until the completion of not less than two scholastic years' work. Upon the completion of the required college work, these candidates are appointed midshipmen in the Navy and are ordered to duty for flight training. The candidates in groups (3) and (4), upon enrollment in the program, are appointed midshipmen in the Navy and are ordered to duty for flight training. The candidates under this training program may be commissioned as ensigns in the line of the Navy or second lieutenants in the Marine Corps following the satisfactory completion of 2 years' flight training and flight duty as midshipmen.

The Air Force desires to conduct a college aviation program similar to that described above, which would likewise render inapplicable the present requirement for enlisted pilots. The Department of the Air Force contends that the responsibility of command and employment of modern aircraft is of such nature as to require the qualifications of commissioned personnel.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to present this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment. The Navy Department accordingly recommends enactment of this measure.

Enactment of the proposed legislation will result in no additional cost to the Government inasmuch as it is designed to repeal unnecessary provisions of law.

This report has been coordinated within the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN NICHOLAS BROWN, Acting.

FULL COMMITTEE HEARINGS ON NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVE NO. 2

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Tuesday, March 15, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Commodore, will you come forward.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Commodore, under the law you are required to come here to consult with the committee with reference to any changes in the naval petroleum reserves. I understand you have some comment to make in regard to Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2, the Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be pleased to hear what you have to say.

STATEMENT OF W. G. GREENMAN, COMMODORE, UNITED STATES NAVY, DIRECTOR, NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVES

Commodore GREENMAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have no prepared statement, for the reason that I submitted to you copies of all of the correspondence with relation to this proposition sometime ago.

However, if I may be permitted, I would like to read the Secretary's letter addressed to you.

The CHAIRMAN. One minute——

Commodore GREENMAN. And then from there to attempt to make any explanation that the committee might desire in connection with this.

The CHAIRMAN. All the information you sent me was mailed to each member of the committee.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They all had a copy of it at that time. Go ahead.

Commodore GREENMAN (reading):

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter is addressed to you in compliance with the act of June 17, 1944 (58 Stat. 280; 34 U. S. C. 524) which requires, among other things, that no contract relating to lands of the naval petroleum reserves shall become effective until after consultation in regard to all its details with the Armed Services Committees of Congress and after approval by the President.

Appended (appendix J) is a proposed unit agreement for the 27-B pool of the Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Kern County, Calif. (Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2). This agreement has been negotiated by the Director, Naval Petroleum Reserves, in consultation with the United States Geological Survey and representatives of the Union Oil Co. of California, Tide Water Associated Oil Co., Murvale Oil Co., Honolulu Oil Corp, and the Standard Oil Co. of California, to the point where the Navy Department and the participating companies are in agreement on its form and provisions. The Judge Advocate General of the Navy has approved this agreement as to legality. I now submit the final draft of the agreement for your consideration and for such consultation thereon as your committee may desire. After consultation with your committee, Presidential approval must be obtained before it becomes effective. In this connection I invited attention to an index of related correspondence which was enclosed in the original brochure that I submitted to the committee.

Digitized by Google

I have forwarded this proposed agreement to the Secretary of the Interior for his views as to whether or not its terms and conditions are sufficiently in the public interest to warrant my approval, and to the Attorney General for his approval as to legality.

The Secretary of the Interior, in his reply dated January 3, 1949 (see appendix E) informs me that in his opinion the terms and conditions of the agreement are sufficiently in the public interest to warrant my approval. However, he mentions three points for consideration without making any recommendation or objectionable inference. These points all have to do with clarification of the document. The suggested changes have been adopted by the Navy Department, on advice of the Judge Advocate General, and have been reviewed by the Attorney General as indicated in his letter to me (see appendix F). All the participating parties have agreed to their inclusion and they have been embodied in the agreement or are covered by the supplemental letter to the Secretary of the Navy (appendix K) referred to below.

The Attorney General, in response to my inquiry as to the legality of the instruments, advises me in his letter of February 1, 1949 (see appendix F) that in his opinion the proposed agreement conforms with Federal law. He suggests, however, the deletion from section 17 (b) of the last phrase thereof because it is not relevant to the agreement and because it might impinge on the authority of the legislative branch of the Government. This suggested deletion has been agreed to by the Navy Department after consultation with the Judge Advocate General. The participants have accepted the change and it has been deleted from the agreement.

There is attached to the unit agreement a proposed letter addressed to the Secretary of the Navy which will be signed by all participants. This letter supplements the proposed agreement in that it gives the Navy additional inspection privileges which it does not now have.

Appendix A gives a detailed description of the document. Appendix B sets forth the statutory authority permitting the Secretary of the Navy to enter into this agreement, and the Judge Advocate General's opinion that there is adequate legal consideration and that substantial benefits will flow to the United States when the agreement is entered into and approved. Appendix G is a copy of a letter signed by each participant indicating his willingness to execute this agreement and the above-mentioned letter. Appendix H is a memorandum setting forth a concise statement of what the unit agreement accomplishes.

It is my opinion that prompt unitization of this pool is essential in order to secure the greatest ultimate recovery of oil and that the proposed unit agreement will accomplish this purpose. It is further my opinion that the execution of this agreement will be in the best interests of the Government and that the benefits therefrom will be substantial. Therefore, may I respectfully request that this matter be given the earliest possible consideration by your committee.

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

May I file in the record, Mr. Chairman, a copy of the letter from the Secretary of the Interior and from the Attorney General, which are referred to?

The CHAIRMAN. And also put the unit agreement in the record.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We want a complete record of everything relating to this subject matter.

Commodore GREENMAN. In that event, then, I would like to file starting with my letter to the Secretary, the Judge Advocate General's approval, the Secretary's letters to the Attorney General and to the

Digitized by Google

ecretary of the Interior, the replies from those two Secretaries, and ie letter to you.

The CHAIRMAN. And then the unit agreement.

Commodore GREENMAN. And the unit agreement. That will cover e whole scope.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

At the present time, all lease production from all pools in the Buena Vista Hi field is commingled by each lessee and royalties are paid on such commingled oil This agreement will require segregation of the 27–B pool oil from that from the other pools.

3. The lands in the area concerned comprise 6,755 acres, of which 3,995 acre are owned in fee by the Standard Oil Co. of California, Tide Water Associate Oil Co., and North American Oil Consolidated; 2,760 acres are Government land which have been leased for many years to the Honolulu Oil Corp., Tide Wate Associated Oil Co., Murvale Oil Co., Union Oil Co. of California, and Nort American Oil Consolidated. The Government leases have all been extended fo the life of production by virtue of their having been included in that certai plan-agreement for cooperative development of lands of the United States i Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Kern County, Calif., dated October 1, 193 and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Secretary of the Nav with the consent of the President.

4. The Government leases participating in the unit agreement are Sacrament Nos. 019343, 019386 (b), and 091385 (b), owned by the Honolulu Oil Corp Sacramento Nos. 019352 and 019352 (b), owned by the Union Oil Co. of Calif nia; Sacramento No. 019571, owned by the Tide Water Associated Oil Co.; a Sacramento No. 019577, owned by the Murvale Oil Co. The properties of Nor American Oil Consolidated (600 acres) comprising 4.98 percent of the productiv area and 3.467 percent of the productive sand volume thus far are not committe to the subject agreement either as to said company's Government leases or as its lands owned in fee.

5. Unitization means the consolidation of the interests of all owners and t operation of the entire area as a single property to eliminate present competiti operations and incident uneconomical practices. It permits effective reserv control by shutting in high gas-oil ratio wells with resultant conservation reservoir energy and restoration of reservior pressure and pressure-control ope tions by gas injection. This control assures a greater ultimate oil recovery a lower costs than would be possible under competitive operations.

6. The agreement provides for unitization on the basis of the acre-feet of p ductive formations in the pool. This method is a sound engineering and scient basis for determining, fairly, participating interests under the conditions existi in the pool. Participations under the agreement are as follows:

	Perce
Standard	77. 74
Tide Water Associated	9. 70
Honolulu	7. 86
Murvale	2. 95
Union	1. 72

On this basis, the privately owned lands of Standard and Tide Water Associa will participate in production and expense to the extent of 80.82225 perce and the Government's leased lands to the extent of 19.17775 percent. This an extremely advantageous basis of sharing as far as the United States and lessees are concerned. This is because under normal competitive operation i. e., in the absence of unitization due to their locations with respect to structu conditions—the Government's lessees will be unable to produce as much of remaining recoverable oil in the pool as the 19.17775 percent which is alloca and guaranteed them under the proposed agreement. It is estimated that so 400 acres (15 percent) of the lands of the participating Government lessees within the present limits of the gas cap and 250 acres (9.5 percent) are within area into which water has encroached. The Government will receive its roy on the basis of the participations assigned to its lessees under the unit agreem regardless of these conditions which could well have caused these areas to be counted or weighted downward in computing sand volumes which, fortunate was not done. (See map, p. 37 of enclosure (A) hereto.)

7. In oil pools where migration of oil occurs as in this pool, it is only by uniti tion that the soundest and most efficient oil-field practices can be achie Without unitization under an agreement such as the one here presented, e lessee must fend for himself and neither the lessee nor the Government land can adopt or force the practices that are so necessary to insure economically greatest ultimate recovery. The Government has now no control over privat owned land and no effective control over the rate and quantity of production f its leased lands. Under the unit agreement, the participants agree to cond

ir operations to obtain the maximum economic recovery of oil, gas, and assoted hydrocarbons from the unit area in accordance with sound oil-field engiring practices and without waste; they further agree to institute gas injection d pressure-control operations to that end. Furthermore, the participants ee that if the Secretary of the Navy shall be of the opinion that the rates of oduction are not fixed in accordance with sound and efficient oil-field practices, may demand that this be done through an arbitration procedure provided in agreement. This permits the exercise of a power which the Secretary of the vy does not have and would not have except for this agreement.

8. The existing leases covering Government lands have "sliding scale" royalty es depending upon the average daily production per well on each lease. Such yalty rates are not fair or practical under this unit agreement for the following sons:

(a) Economy and efficiency of operation of this pool dictate the cutting down rather than increasing or maintaining the present number of operating wells. A sliding-scale royalty arrangement inevitably tends to work against this desirable result.

(b) The necessary segregation of the oil produced from the pool from that produced from the horizons above the pool would deprive the lessees of their now existing right to average oil from wells having higher production with the oil from wells having lower production and thus by averaging obtain a lower royalty rate. If the sliding-scale rates in the existing leases were applied to the segregated oil, it would actually mean that the lessees would be penalized in entering the agreement as they would be required to pay the Government higher royalty than they do now, which is not fair.

r these reasons, it was necessary to negotiate a flat royalty rate for the pool oduction allocated to these leases in lieu of the existing sliding-scale rates.

9. Studies indicated that under normal competitive operations the royalty te under the sliding-scale provisions of the leases would, in the near future, ach the minimum of 12.5 percent because of the effect on average daily produc-on per well of the 99 old producing wells on Government lands drilled to the per pools. The Director considered that the Government should receive yalty on all additional oil to be produced from the pool and allocated to the overnment lands as a result of the unit agreement. Proceeding on this basis d still maintaining the sliding-scale royalty rates of the original leases but gregating production from the pool, a flat across-the-board fixed royalty rate as calculated for the pool on the basis of an estimated decline in production ovided by the United States Geological Survey. By this means, 12.9 percent as determined to be a fair royalty rate for the remaining life of the pool under nitization, and that it would yield approximately the same royalty as the sliding-cale rates were the additional oil accruing from unitization actually produced om the leased land without unitization. The 12.9-percent rate for royalty oil is ot only higher than a minimum which would soon be reached if competitive perations continue but, in the Director's opinion, it will yield the Government onsiderably more revenue than it could possibly anticipate were the unit agree-ent not entered into. In the attached "supplemental statement" are found the stimates which support the negotiated rate of 12.9 percent. The royalty rates n natural gas and natural gasoline allocated to the several Government leases emain unchanged.

10. The Director is of the opinion that prompt unitization of this pool is ssential in order to secure the greatest ultimate recovery of oil, and he believes he proposed unit agreement will accomplish this purpose and is in the best nterests of the Government. Therefore, it is recommended that this unit agreement, if approved by you, be submitted by you to the Attorney General for an pinion as to its legality, to the Secretary of the Interior for an opinion as to whether its terms and conditions are sufficiently in the public interest, and then orwarded to the Armed Services Committees of the Congress for such con-ultation as they desire to hold to comply with the law. After such consultation, he agreement must be submitted to the President for his consent and finally igned by you.

W. G. GREENMAN.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT

A feature of the proposed unit agreement for the 27–B pool which must be noted is that the gas-cap areas and the areas into which water has encroached have been given the same credit for productivity as the clean-oil productive areas; i. e., they have not been weighted downward or discounted because of the inability of wells in this area to produce as much oil as the wells in areas not so affected. Consequently, the allocation of oil under the agreement to the Government's leased lands in the gas cap is much greater than these areas can produce.

Digitized by Google

Production from the participating Government lands in the area unitized has declined from 16.27 percent of production in January 1947 to 13.19 percent in January 1948 and to 11.07 percent in August 1948. Under the unit agreement the participating Government leases will be allocated 19.17775 percent of production, or 73.24 percent more oil than was produced therefrom in August 1948.

The following tabulated figures prepared by the United States Geological Survey and by the inspector, naval petroleum reserves in California, reflect estimates which have been made to show the quantities of oil which would be produced and the royalties the Government would receive from the participating leased lands under both competitive operations and unitization.

Under competitive operations

	Reserves, barrels	Royalty
		Barrels	Percen
U. S. Geological Survey	4,572,000	571,500	12
Inspector, naval petroleum reserves in California	8,640,000	1,080,000	12

Under unit agreement

	Allocated, barrels	Royalty
		Barrels	Perce
U. S. Geological Survey	11,622,000	1,452,750	12
Inspector, naval petroleum reserves in California	11,520,000	1,440,000	12

The United States Geological Survey estimate made on the basis of prese lease rates would provide between 22,000 and 30,000 barrels of royalty oil excess of the number of barrels of royalty oil that would accrue if a flat 12 percent royalty were in effect, and that a fair royalty rate would be one-eigh of the allocated oil plus such additional oil, or between 12.69 and 12.76 perce on the basis of 11,622,000 barrels of allocated oil above indicated.

A separate estimate made in the Office of the Director, based on an anticipat decline in production from the 27–B pool under unitization taken from the en neering report, 27–B pool, Buena Vista Hills field, prepared in connection wi the proposed unit operation by C. T. Murray and L. J. Blessing, United Stat Geological Survey, March 18, 1948, over a 14-year period from 1949 to 196 inclusive, and from an average daily production of 25,000 barrels per day in 19 to 3,000 barrels per day in 1962; the continued decline of the old wells at the present indicated rates; and allocating production from the 27–B pool to t leased lands on the basis of 19.17775 percent in the unit agreement developed t following results:

Estimated total production, 27–B pool	barrels	60,644,7
Estimated allocation to participating leases	do	11,630,3
Estimated Government royalty under present lease terms	do	1,503,1
Estimated Government royalty under present lease terms	percent	12.9

All engineers who have worked on this problem have estimated that the recov able oil in the participating area will be increased by approximately 20,000,0 barrels through unitization and pressure maintenance or from approximate 40,000,000 barrels under competitive conditions to more than 60,000,000 barr under unitization.

In connection with these estimates, it is interesting to note that using t estimates least favorable to the Government under both continued competit operations and under unitization, there is an indicated benefit to the Governme from operations under the agreement amounting to some 360,000 barrels of ad tional royalty oil. On the basis of present prices, this represents a cash bene o the Government through the agreement of $928,800. However, the possible enefits may be considerably greater than this estimated sum.

The current price for 27–B pool oil from the leased lands (average gravity 0.6°) is $2.58 per barrel.

nclosures: (A) Suggested letter to the Attorney General.
(B) Suggested letter to the Secretary of the Interior.

1. Forwarded. Subject agreement is approved as to legality in its present form.

2. The authority for the Secretary of the Navy, with the consent of the Presi-ent, to enter into this agreement is to be found in the act of Congress of February 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), as amended by the act of Congress approved August 8, 946 (60 Stat. 950) and the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 813) as amended by the cts of Congress approved June 30, 1938 (52 Stat. 1252), and June 17, 1944 58 Stat. 280).

3. The act of June 4, 1920, as amended, directs the Secretary of the Navy to ake possession of all properties within the naval petroleum reserves as are or ay become subject to the control and use by the United States for naval purposes; o explore, prospect, conserve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion, ubject to approval by the President, directly or by contract, lease, or otherwise; nd by the amendatory act of June 17, 1944 (58 Stat. 280), provided further that he Secretary of the Navy, as to Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 1, may enter into ontracts for joint, unit, or other cooperative plans of exploration, prospecting, onservation, development, use, and operation of lands owned or controlled by he United States within that reserve and lands owned or leased by private inter-sts within the reserve or outside thereof upon certain conditions set forth in the ct.

4. The act of August 8, 1946 (60 Stat. 950), which amended the act of Febru-ry 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), provides that the Secretary of the Navy is authorized ith the consent of the President to enter into agreements such as those provided or in section 17 (b) of the act of February 25, 1920, as amended by the act of ugust 8, 1946, which agreements shall not, unless expressed therein, operate to xtend the term of any lease affected thereby.

5. Section 17 (b) of the act of February 25, 1920, as amended by the act of ugust 8, 1946, provides that for the purpose of more properly conserving the atural resources of any oil or gas pool, field, or like area, or any part thereof whether or not any part of said oil or gas pool, field, or like area is then subject o any cooperative or unit plan of development or operation), lessees thereof and heir representatives may unite with each other or jointly or separately with thers in collectively adopting and operating under a cooperative or unit plan f development or operation of such pool, field, or like area, or any part thereof, henever determined and certified by the Secretary of the Interior to be necessary r advisable in the public interest. The Secretary is authorized, in his discretion, with the consent of the holders of leases involved, to establish, alter, change, or evoke drilling, producing, rental, minimum royalty and royalty requirements f such leases and to make such regulations with reference to such leases, with like consent on the part of the lessees, in connection with the institution and operation f any such cooperative or unit plan as he may deem necessary or proper to secure he proper protection of the public interest. The Secretary is also authorized in any such plan to include a provision whereby authority is vested in the Secretary r any such person, committee, or State or Federal officer or agency as may be designated in the plan, to alter or modify from time to time the rate of prospecting and development and the quantity and rate of production under such plan.

6. The lands of the United States which would be subject to this unit agreement have been leased to private parties, and such leases have been extended beyond their original 20-year terms by virtue of their inclusion under that certain plan-agreement for cooperative development of lands of the United States in Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Kern County, Calif., dated October 1, 1935, heretofore approved by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Secretary of the Navy, with consent of the President of the United States. Notwithstanding that such lands are subject to said plan-agreement, this agreement may be entered into and approved under section 13 of the act of August 8, 1946, which provides:

"SEC. 13. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as affecting existing leases within the borders of the naval petroleum reserves, or agreements concerning operations thereunder or in relation thereto, but the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, with the consent of the President, to enter into agreements such as those provided for in section 17 (b) of the Act of February 25, 1920, as amended by this Act, which agreements shall not, unless expressed therein, operate to extend the term of any lease affected thereby."

7. There is adequate legal consideration, and substantial benefits will flow to the United States, when this unit agreement is entered into and approved, as it will—

(a) Assure that the Government will receive royalty on a larger percentage of the oil to be produced from the pool than it could otherwise expect to receive under competititve operations.

(b) Assure the Government that the lands (both Government and privately owned) will be operated in accordance with sound and efficient oil-field practices, thus assuring a greater ultimate recovery of oil from the pool which is in the public interest and in aid of national defense.

(c) Provide a method of arbitration to determine production rates from the pool, if it appears to the Secretary of the Navy that the pool is not being operated in accordance with sound and efficient oil-field practices to obtain ultimately the economic maximum recovery of oil, gas, and associated hydrocarbons from the pool. The Secretary of the Navy presently has no such right with respect to the privately owned lands nor has he any effective control over the quantity and rate of production under the leases on the Government lands which will be made subject to the unit agreement.

8. The United States is not required to pay any of the costs of developing and operating the pool, as all such costs are to be borne by the lessees of the Government and the owners of the private lands who are participants under the unit agreement.

9. While the primary statutory authority for entering into or approval of this agreement is to be found in section 13 of the act of August 8, 1946, both this act and the act of June 17, 1944, require the approval or consent of the President, and the latter act requires consultation with the Armed Services Committees of the Congress. In anticipation of your desire to transmit this matter to the Attorney General for an opinion as to legality and to the Secretary of the Interior for an opinion as to whether its terms and conditions are sufficiently in the public interest, there are submitted herewith suggested letters of transmittal to the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior. It is recommended that they be signed and returned to this office for mailing. Upon receipt of replies from the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior, appropriate letters will be prepared for your signature submitting the unit agreement to the chairmen of the Armed Services Committees of the Congress.

APPENDIX C

DECEMBER 3, 1948.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: There is submitted herewith a copy of a proposed unit agreement for the 27–B pool of the Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Kern County, Calif., between Union Oil Co. of California, Tide Water Associated Oil Co., Murvale Oil Co., Honolulu Oil Corp., and Standard Oil Co. of California, along with a letter to me from the Director, Naval Petroleum Reserves, which discusses its details, and the endorsement thereon of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy.

At the request of the Navy, representatives of the United States Geological Survey have participated in the negotiations leading up to this agreement, and their cooperation has been most helpful.

I am advised that this unit agreement closely conforms with the principles incorporated in the unit agreement for the Gatchell zone of the Coalinga Nose oil and gas field in Fresno County, Calif., which your Department has recently approved.

May I request that you cause this unit agreement to be reviewed and advise me if, in your opinion, the terms and conditions therein are sufficiently in the public erest to warrant approval thereof by the Secretary of the Navy, with the con-it of the President.

I am forwarding a copy of the unit agreement to the Attorney General for his inion as to its legality. I shall, therefore, not request you to pass upon the tter from a legal standpoint. A copy of my letter to the Attorney General mitting the matter to him is enclosed. Upon receipt of your views and the torney General's opinion, I propose to send the agreement with copies of your ly and the Attorney General's opinion to the chairmen of the Armed Services mmittees of the Congress for their review and such consultation as may be sired.
Your early consideration will be appreciated.
Sincerely yours,

M. E. ANDREWS,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

APPENDIX D

DECEMBER 3, 1948.

ie honorable the ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: There is submitted herewith for your proval as to legality a draft of a proposed unit agreement for the 27–B pool of e Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Kern County, Calif., between Union Oil
. of California, Tide Water Associated Oil Co., Murvale Oil Co., Honolulu Oil rp., and Standard Oil Co. of California, along with a letter to me from the rector, Naval Petroleum Reserves, concerning the agreement, and the endorse-nt of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy thereon.
This unit agreement involves Government lands which are under oil and gas ses to private parties, and privately owned lands within the boundaries of aval Petroleum Reserve No. 2. The agreement cannot become effective until proved by the Secretary of the Navy, with the consent of the President. The it agreement generally follows the form of the unit agreement for the Gatchell ne of the Coalinga Nose oil and gas field in Fresno County, Calif., recently proved by the Secretary of the Interior for public land leases under the prosions of the Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, as amended (41 Stat. 437).
The Judge Advocate General of the Navy has approved this unit agreement as legality.
This unit agreement will be submitted to the Armed Services Committees of ie Congress for their consideration and consultation thereon as required by the t of June 17, 1944, immediately upon receipt of your opinion as to its legality.
It is my opinion, and I find that the entering into and approval of this unit greement will be in the interest of the United States and that the benefits and nsiderations flowing to the Government are both adequate and substantial.
Your early consideration will be very much appreciated.
Sincerely yours,

M. E. ANDREWS,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Enclosures: (3).

APPENDIX E

JANUARY 3, 1949.

Ion. M. E. ANDREWS,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of December 3, ubmitting copy of a proposed unit agreement for the 27–B pool of the Buena ista Hills oil and gas field in Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2, Kern County, alif., and certain correspondence incident thereto. Request was made for eview of the agreement and advice as to whether, in my opinion from a nonlegal tandpoint, the terms and conditions therein are sufficiently in the public interest o warrant approval thereof by the Secretary of the Navy, with the consent of he President.
The agreement substantially follows the principles incorporated in the unit greement for the Gatchell zone of the Coalinga Nose oil and gas field, Fresno County, Calif., the form of which was approved by this Department July 22, 1948.

Digitized by Google

Commodore Greenman's memorandum of November 24, 1948, to you summarizes the case concisely and comprehensively and I concur in principle with the factual statements appearing therein. It appears that the purposes of unitization will be accomplished and that greater ultimate recovery of oil and gas will be realized with increased efficiency and economy, and with resultant prevention of waste. The interests of all parties, including the Government, appear to be adequately protected.

After review of the agreement, the following points are mentioned without recommendation or objectional inference, merely for your noting, as it is realized that changes you may not consider of serious import would be inadvisable at this late date:

1. The references in section 13 (b) of page 23 to "paragraph (a) of section 13" and to "paragraph (b) of this section" in line 2 of page 24 appear to be in error. Possibly reference is intended to the corresponding paragraphs of section 1(instead, as (a) of section 13 would nullify the "notwithstanding" language and (b) of section 13 would be unnecessary.

2. In section 21 of page 31, termination, except by unanimous consent, i subject to determination of "paying quantities" by the participants. The phras "as determined by the participants" was omitted from the Coalinga Nose agree ment.

3. Right of inspection in section 26 and obligation to furnish records in sectio 27 of page 34 are limited to participants. In the Coalinga Nose case a supple mental stipulation will be furnished by the participants agreeing to permi inspections and to furnish certain records to proper Government representative pursuant to similar sections.

Accordingly, in my opinion from a nonlegal standpoint, the terms and condi tions in the proposed unit agreement for the 27–B pool of the Buena Vista Hill oil and gas field are sufficiently in the public interest to warrant approval thereo by the Secretary of the Navy, with the consent of the President.

Sincerely yours,

J. A. KRUG,
Secretary of the Interior.

Enclosure 110.

APPENDIX F

FEBRUARY 1, 1949.

The honorable, the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: By letter of December 3, 1948, the Acting Secretar of the Navy submitted a proposed unit agreement for the 27–B pool of the Buen Vista Hills oil and gas field, Kern County, Calif., and requested my opinion a to its legality.

Subsequently, Commodore W. G. Greenman, Director, Naval Petroleu Reserves, acting upon certain suggestions made by the Secretary of the Interio in his letter to you of January 3, 1949, and other suggestions made in this Depart ment, submitted the following changes in the proposed unit agreement, which h states have been approved by the oil companies concerned:

(1) Section 13 (b) is changed to read as follows:

"(b) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this agreement and without prejudice to the right to the Participants to remove Operator b affirmative agreement in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (a) of thi section, Operator may be removed at any time by the unanimous agreement o all Participants, except Operator and any other Participants the greater part o whose stock is owned or controlled by Operator or which own or control th greater part of the stock of Operator."

(2) In section 17 (b), page 29, line 1, a period is to be inserted after the word "paid" and the following words eliminated: "such basis to be in lieu of any othe basis of computation now or hereafter provided by law or regulation."

(3) In section 21, the following words are to be eliminated: "as determined by the Participants".

With his letter of December 3, the Acting Secretary enclosed a copy of a opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy dated December 2, 1948, i which he approved the proposed agreement as to legality, and the Office of th Judge Advocate General has advised me informally that he also approves th above-mentioned changes.

The proposed agreement sets forth in recital No. 8, as authority therefor, th following statutes:

Digitized by Google

"Act of Congress of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), as amended by the amendtory Act of Congress of August 8, 1946 (60 Stat. 950); the Act of Congress of une 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 813), as amended by the Amendatory Acts of Congress of une 30, 1938 (52 Stat. 1252) and of June 17, 1944 (58 Stat. 280); and * * * ection 3301 of the Public Resources Code of California."

Section 3301 of the Public Resources Code of California provides for approval y the State oil and gas supervisor of agreements for the cooperative development nd operation of oil and gas fields, and I am informed that the proposed agreement as been submitted to him by the oil companies participating therein. I express o opinion concerning that phase of the matter.

I take note of the Acting Secretary's opinion and finding, as stated in this letter f submission, "that the entering into and approval of this unit agreement will e in the interest of the United States and that the benefits and considerations owing to the Government are both adequate and substantial." Based upon that nding and opinion, which will be subject to the scrutiny and review of the resident and of the Armed Services Committees of the Congress, and based also pon my examination of the applicable Federal statutes, it is my opinion that ie proposed agreement conforms with Federal law.

Sincerely yours,

PEYTON FORD,
Acting Attorney General.

APPENDIX H

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR, NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVES,
Washington 25, D. C., February 2, 1949.

MEMORANDUM

ubject: Concise statement of the accomplished unit agreement for the 27–B pool of the Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field (Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2) in California.

(a) The 27–B pool is a separate pool of oil lying stratigraphically lower than e other pools in Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2 which have been producing r many years.

Digitized by Google

(b) The land overlaying this pool comprises 6,755 acres, of which 3,995 acres are owned in fee and the remainder by four Government leases.

(c) Each operator in this pool is now producing oil from the pool competitively without regard for the other's interests. This practice, if continued, will soon so deplete pressures in the pool as to cause deterioration of the entire pool, and will result in substantial losses to all concerned.

(d) This unit agreement operates to segregate the 27–B pool from the pools above or below it, and provides for its operation as a unit under one operator with all participating parties sharing production and costs on the basis of participating percentages. This is the only means by which the greatest ultimate recovery of production can be assured.

(e) In addition, a gas-injection program is required under this agreement which will restore reservoir energy to the pool which energy has been inordinately reduced by present competitive operations. This injection program is designed to extend materially the productive life of the field.

(f) The agreed-to percentages of participation are as follows:

	Percent
Standard	77. 74578
Tide Water Associated	9. 70687
Honolulu	7. 86180
Murvale	2. 95748
Union	1. 72807

On this basis, Government lessees will participate in production to the extent of 19.17775 percent. This is extremely advantageous to the Government because it is a greater percentage of the remaining oil than the lessees can expect to produce under competitive operation by approximately 73 percent, not to mention the lessee's share of additional production incident to the gas injection program.

(g) Under this agreement, the Government will receive a 12.9-percent royalty on all oil produced from the 27–B pool allocated to Government leases (19.17775 percent of total production from the pool) which is greater than the average royalty now received from all pools under the individual leases. This higher royalty will continue for the life of the field and is of additional advantage because it will apply to all oil recovered by the lessee incident to the repressuring program which will amount to an estimated 5,000,000 barrels.

There is adequate legal consideration and substantial benefits will flow to the United States when this unit agreement is executed as it will—

(1) Assure the Government receipt of royalty on a larger percentage of the oil to be produced from the pool than it would otherwise receive under competitive operations.

(2) Assure the Government that the lands (both Government and privately owned) will be operated in accordance with sound and efficient oil-field practices, and assure a greater ultimate recovery of oil from the pool.

(3) Provide a method of arbitration to determine production rates from the pool, if it appears to the Secretary of the Navy that the pool is not being operated in accordance with sound and efficient oil-field practices to obtain ultimately the economic maximum recovery of oil, gas, and associated hydrocarbons from the pool. (The Secretary of the Navy presently has no such right with respect to the privately owned lands nor has he any effective control over the quantity and rate of production under the leases on the Government lands which will be made subject to the unit agreement.)

In addition, the United States is not required to pay any of the costs of developing and operating the pool, as all such costs will be borne by the lessees of the Government and the owners of the private lands who are participants under the unit agreement.

The Secretary of the Interior finds the agreement in the public interest; the Judge Advocate General of the Navy and the Attorney General have approved it as to legality, and the Secretary of the Navy finds that the benefits and considerations flowing to the Government are both adequate and substantial, and recommends its approval.

Commodore, United States Navy,
Director, Naval Petroleum Reserves.

RECITALS

1. This agreement relates to and affects those certain lands located in Kern ounty, California, which are hereinafter referred to as the "Area" and which are ndicated by the area circumscribed by the heavy black line on the map attached ereto, marked Exhibit "A", and hereby made a part hereof.

Digitized by Google

2. The lands which comprise the Area and the respective interests of the Participants in and to such lands are more fully described and identified in the table which is attached hereto, marked Exhibit "B", and hereby made a part of this agreement.

3. Participants who are the lessees under the U. S. Government leases covering lands of the United States within the Area are also parties to that certain "Plan-Agreement for Cooperative Development of Lands of the United States in Buena Vista Hills Oil and Gas Field, Kern County, California," dated October 1, 1935 (NOd–795–I–Sec. 187).

4. Participants are also parties to that certain "Plan for Cooperative Development of the Buena Vista Hills Oil and Gas Field, Kern County, California," dated October 1, 1935.

5. The "27-B Pool," hereinafter defined, is a part of the "Old Pool," as defined in such Plan for Cooperative Development.

6. This agreement, except as it applies to the 27–B Pool, shall not affect the "Old Pool" as defined in said Plan-Agreement and in said Plan, or its development and operation as set forth therein.

7. Participants, with the approval of the United States of America as to lands owned by it and subject to the U. S. Government leases, desire to enter into this agreement for the control of pressures in the 27–B Pool and for the purpose of endeavoring to obtain the maximum economic ultimate recovery of oil, gas, natural gasoline, and associated hydrocarbons therefrom, without waste as defined in this agreement.

8. Statutory authority for this agreement is to be found in the Act of Congress of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), as amended by the amendatory Act of Congress of August 8, 1946 (60 Stat. 950); the Act of Congress of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 813), as amended by the Amendatory Acts of Congress of June 30, 1938 (52 Stat. 1252) and of June 17, 1944 (58 Stat. 280); and in Section 3301 of the Public Resources Code of California.

NOW, THEREFORE, Participants, in consideration of the premises and of the mutual undertakings herein contained, do hereby agree as follows:

SECTION 1. UNITIZATION—CONSERVATION

The rights of Participants to develop and operate in and to produce from the 27–B Pool oil, gas, and associated hydrocarbons, and the oil, gas, and associated hydrocarbons in the 27–B Pool, and produced therefrom, are hereby unitized, to the end that the 27–B Pool shall be developed and operated as a unit by a single operator. All operations conducted under this agreement, upon lands subject hereto and which relate to or in any way affect the 27–B Pool, shall be conducted so as to endeavor to obtain the maximum economic recovery of oil, gas, and associated hydrocarbons from such 27–B Pool in accordance with sound oil field engineering practices and without waste as defined in this agreement.

SECTION 2. DEFINITIONS

For the purpose of this agreement, the terms herein used are defined as follows:

(a) AREA shall mean that portion of the Buena Vista Hills Oil and Gas Field which, as shown on the map attached hereto marked Exhibit "A", is encompassed by the heavy black line or by any extension or extensions thereof made in the manner hereinafter provided.

(b) 27–B POOL shall mean and include the series of sands and shales commonly designated as "Basal Etchegoin Sands." Such sands are more specifically identified as the E_1, E_2 (E_2 and E_3 sands combined as a single member), and E_4 sands existing between the E_1 point and the base of the E_4 sand as shown on the electric logs of the wells listed on Exhibit "D" attached hereto. The base of the "Basal Etchegoin Sands" is above the basal limit of the "Old Pool" as defined in the "Plan for Cooperative Development of the Buena Vista Oil and Gas Field, Kern County, California," referred to in Recital 4 hereof.

(c) LESSEE or OWNER shall mean the owner of the right to develop, operate, and produce oil, gas, natural gasoline, and associated hydrocarbons, whether as lessee or otherwise, and, therefore, shall include the owner of lands not under lease. Such terms shall refer to the Participant owning such right at the time when said lands originally became subject hereto, and to its successors and assigns.

(d) OPERATOR shall mean the Participant who at any time is designated to construct, maintain, operate, and repair the central crude-oil storage and the pressure-maintenance plant or plants and other jointly-owned equipment and ilities and to drill, redrill, operate, and repair wells and to perform such other ties as are provided in this agreement. Such term shall refer not only to the ginal Operator but also to any successor of Operator selected by the Partici- nts as herein provided, unless a contrary intention is indicated in the context.

(e) PARTICIPANTS shall mean the Lessees and Owners of lands within the Area o execute this agreement as Participants, and shall also mean successors and igns of any of them.

f) PARTICIPATING EQUITY shall mean each Participant's percentage share of ude oil and wet gas, as such percentage share shall be determined under the visions of this agreement.

g) ACCOUNTING PROCEDURE shall mean the accounting procedure set forth l provided for in a supplemental agreement between the Participants, entered o of even date herewith.

h) ACRE-FOOT shall mean one acre, one foot thick, of oil and/or gas bearing mations in the 27–B Pool determined by the Participants to be productive of or gas.

i) CRUDE OIL shall mean all liquid hydrocarbons produced and saved from 27–B Pool and delivered into the central crude-oil storage facilities for dis- ution among the Participants as herein provided.

j) WET GAS shall mean all gas produced and saved from the 27–B Pool pur- nt to this agreement (including field tank vapors and gasoline drips).

k) RESIDUAL DRY GAS shall mean that portion of WET GAS produced and ed from the 27–B Pool which remains after the extraction of natural gasoline l or other liquid hydrocarbons therefrom.

l) WASTE shall mean (i) such avoidable loss or destruction of oil, gas and ociated hydrocarbons after recovery as prevents the economic utilization reof, or (ii) avoidable inefficient or excessive use or dissipation of reservoir rgy resulting in substantial loss in maximum economic recovery of oil, gas l associated hydrocarbons which, in either case, shall be the approximate result cts or omissions which a reasonably prudent operator would not do or suffer remain undone under like or similar circumstances.

SECTION 3. PARTICIPATIONS IN PRODUCTION

a) On the attached map, Exhibit "A," in addition to the heavy black line which ws the Area, there is a dashed line which indicates the estimated location of exterior boundary of the 27–B Pool as of the date of discovery of oil and gas such pool. Such dashed line is hereinafter referred to as the composite pro- tive limits line of the 27–B Pool. The portion of the Area which has been de subject to this agreement within such dashed line is hereinafter referred to the initial participating area, and the lands which comprise such initial par- pating area are hereinafter referred to as initial participating lands.

b) In Exhibit "B" to this agreement are listed definitely described and num- ed tracts of land. Set opposite each such numbered tract is a figure which resents the estimated acre-feet of productive oil and/or gas sands which formed art of the 27–B Pool as of the date of discovery of oil and gas in such Pool, l which underlie the initial participating area of such numbered tract. Such res are hereinafter referred to as the initial acre-feet figures of the respective cts of land to which they refer.

c) Irrespective of any further information which may be obtained as a result additional drilling or other operations inside or outside the Area, the afore- ntioned figures representing the estimated acre-feet of productive 27–B Pool and or gas sands within the initial participating area of the numbered tracts and listed in Exhibit "B" hereto shall not be modified or altered in any respect ring the term of this agreement except with the unanimous consent of all rticipants and the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

d) In addition to the initial acre-feet figures set opposite each of the afore- ntioned tracts of land, there is also set opposite each such numbered tract a centage value which represents the ratio between (1) the estimate acre-feet productive oil and/or gas sand which formed a part of the 27–B Pool as of the te of discovery of oil and gas in such Pool, and which underlie the initial par- pating area of that numbered tract of land, and (2) the total of such estimated e-feet underlying the initial participating area of all of the numbered tracts ich have been made subject to this agreement.

e) Subject to the further provisions of this agreement, of the total oil, gas, l other hydrocarbons produced and saved from the 27–B Pool pursuant to s agreement, there shall be allocated to each numbered tract the percentage presented, at the time of such allocation, by the percentage value set opposite such tract on Exhibit "B," or on any revision or revisions thereof. Such percentag values were determined by the Participants to reflect original reservoir condition in the 27-B Pool.

(f) Each Participant shall own a percentage of the total oil, gas, and oth hydrocarbons produced and saved from the 27-B Pool pursuant to this agreemen equal to the sum of the percentage values set forth in Exhibit "B," or in an revision or revisions thereof, opposite the numbered tracts which are owned o leased by such Participant. For convenience the sum of the percentage value which correspond to all lands of each Participant, hereinafter sometimes referre to as the "Percentage Participation" or "Participating Equity" of such Partic pant, is set forth in Exhibit "C," which is attached to this agreement and mad a part hereof. Upon any revision or revisions of Exhibit "B," Exhibit "C" sha also be so revised as to set forth the correct revised Participating Equities of th respective Participants.

(g) In the event any numbered tract listed on Exhibit "B" is now or hereafte becomes divided, or further divided, by a Participant owning or acquiring a interest as to only a part or portions of said numbered tract, the Percentag Participations or Participating Equities of the owners or lessees of such numbere tract, as the same are set forth in Exhibit "C" hereto, shall be adjusted in accor ance with the agreement between the persons who are the owners or lessees o interests in such numbered tract. In the absence of an agreement between th interested persons fixing the division of ownership, revision of the Participati Equities as set forth in Exhibit "C" and distribution of production from the 27-B Pool allocated to such numbered tract shall be made on a surface acreage basis irrespective of whether such division of ownership is separate or undivided.

SECTION 4. ENLARGEMENT OF AREA AND ADJUSTMENT OF INTERESTS

(a) It is recognized by the Participants that after the effective date of thi agreement additional wells drilled into the 27-B Pool on lands inside or outsid the Area may furnish data and information which will indicate that lands the inside or outside the Area, not proved to be productive on the effective date hereo are capable of producing commercial quantities of oil, gas, or other hydrocarbon from the 27-B Pool. Therefore, upon the completion of any commercially pro ductive well in the 27-B Pool within the period of two (2) years after the effecti date hereof, the Participants, during such two (2) year period and for sixty (60 days thereafter, may: (1) Determine that lands then outside the Area shall b included therein; or (2) with or without including additional lands within th Area, determine that additional acre-feet of productive oil and/or gas saturate sands, outside the composite productive limits line of the 27-B Pool, underli lands which have been made subject to this agreement. The affirmative agree ment of at least four (4) of the Participants representing in the aggregate no less than eighty-seven and one-half percent (87½%) of the total Participati Equities under this agreement shall be necessary to so enlarge the Area, or t determine that additional acre-feet of productive 27-B Pool oil and/or gas sat rated sands outside the composite productive limits line underlie the Area, e the Area as enlarged, or any part thereof. If any additional lands which a nominated for inclusion within the Area are leased or owned by a Participan such Participant shall be conclusively deemed to have agreed to the inclusio of such lands in the Area subject to this agreement. Notwithstanding th within two (2) years and sixty (60) days after the effective date hereof no Pa ticipant shall have requested inclusion of additional lands within the Area, determination that additional acre-feet of productive 27-B Pool sands outsi the composite productive limits line underlie the Area, or any part or par thereof, the Participants, prior to the expiration of such period of two (2) yea and sixty (60) days, shall meet and determine, upon the basis of informati derived from any additional wells drilled into the 27-B Pool during such two (year period, whether any such inclusion or additions shall be made.

(b) If the Area shall be enlarged by the addition of lands as aforesaid, th Participants shall define and describe such additional lands and shall revise th heavy black line on the map, Exhibit "A," so as to include such additional lan within the Area. The lands so added, plus the lands theretofore within the Are shall constitute thereafter the Area until such time as said Area is again enlarg as hereinbefore in this section provided.

(c) If within the aforementioned period of two (2) years and sixty (60) day the Participants determine that additional acre-feet of productive 27-B Po sands outside the composite productive limits line underlie any lands which a then subject to this agreement, they shall also determine the number of such additional acre-feet beneath each such tract of land.

(d) Any determination pursuant to paragraphs (a) and (c) of this section of the number of additional acre-feet of productive oil and/or gas saturated sands which form a part of the 27–B Pool outside of the productive limits line as shown on Exhibit "A" shall be based upon a sound interpretation, in accordance with good petroleum engineering practices, of the electric logs and other pertinent data and information obtained from all wells drilled into the 27–B Pool which have a bearing upon such determination. Such determination or redetermination shall be based upon a logical correlative weighting of the productive oil and/or gas saturated sands as to thickness throughout the entire area outside the composite productive limits line as shown on Exhibit "A," which is affected thereby, and shall reflect original reservoir conditions in the 27–B Pool.

(e) As soon as practicable after any determination, pursuant to Paragraphs (a) and (c) of this section, of the number of additional acre-feet of productive 27–B Pool sands outside the composite productive limits line and beneath any numbered tract or tracts of lands subject to this agreement, the Participants shall recalculate the Percentage Participation for each tract of land which has been made subject to this agreement. Such recalculation shall be based upon the initial acre-feet figures set forth in Exhibit "B" hereto, plus the number of additional acre-feet which shall have been added to any numbered tract or tracts in accordance with the provisions of Paragraphs (a) and (c) of this section. At such time the Participants shall also revise Exhibits "B" and "C" so that such exhibits shall respectively set forth the revised Percentage Participation for each numbered tract of land which has been made subject to this agreement and the revised Participating Equity of each Participant hereunder. Any such recalculation or revision of the Percentage Participations shall not become effective until approved by the Secretary of the Navy and, if and when so approved, shall be effective from seven o'clock a. m. of the first day of the calendar month next following the completion of the well which furnished the data indicating the necessity for enlargement of the Area or recalculation of the Percentage Participations. Operator shall make appropriate adjustments between the Participants to give effect to such recalculated Percentage Participations which, except to the extent hereinbefore specified, shall never have a retroactive effect and shall not require or permit any retroactive adjustment with respect to allocations of oil, gas, gasoline, and other hydrocarbons produced from the 27–B Pool prior to the effective date of such recalculation, or, except as provided in paragraph (g) of this section, of costs or expenses incurred prior to the effective date thereof.

(f) If on the effective date of this agreement any lands or tracts of lands within the Area shall not have been made subject to this agreement, then such lands or tracts of lands shall be disregarded in determining the percentage interests of the remaining tracts which are subject to this agreement, and the lands or tracts of lands not made subject to this agreement shall not be entitled to a Percentage Participation hereunder. Such omitted lands, or tracts of lands, may nevertheless thereafter be made subject to this agreement by the affirmative agreement of all Participants and execution of this agreement by the owner or lessee of such lands or tracts of lands, and, if any part or parts thereof shall be within the participating area, such part or parts shall become entitled to the Percentage Participation approved by all Participants and by the Secretary of the Navy, but such lands or tracts of lands shall receive no allocation of oil, gas or other hydrocarbons produced and saved from the 27–B Pool pursuant to this agreement until the first day of the calendar month following such execution of this agreement by the owner or lessee of such lands; provided however that such owner or lessee shall pay the other Participants its Participating Equity share of the development and capital costs incurred hereunder after the effective date of this agreement, and further provided that such owner or lessee shall meet such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Participants. The Participants shall revise Exhibits "B" and "C" to conform to the provision of this paragraph (f).

(g) Within sixty (60) days after expiration of the first two (2) years of the term of this agreement an adjustment shall be made between the various Participants in such manner that after such adjustments each Participant shall have borne and paid its Participating Equity share, as established at the end of such two (2) year period, of the costs of acquisition and construction of the pressure maintenance plant and facilities and of the central crude oil storage facilities and other jointly-owned facilities constructed by Operator, including any injection wells drilled by Operator for the joint account of Participants during such two (2) year period.

(h) Except as provided in this section, the Participants shall have no power to recalculate or revise the Participating Equities of the Participants or the Percentage Participation assigned to any of the lands within the Area shown on Exhibit "A"; provided that the Participants may divide or consolidate interests to show changes resulting from transfers, assignments, or other disposition of interests.

(i) Anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding, the Participants shall have no power to reduce the Percentage Participation for any of the lands within the Area or the Participating Equity of any Participant by reason of the depletion of oil, gas, gasoline, or other hydrocarbons underlying any lands or the encroachment of water under any lands resulting from the depletion of the Area.

(j) Except as provided in paragraph (f) of this section no change in the Percentage Participation for any lands within the Area shall be made after two (2) years and sixty (60) days after the effective date of this agreement.

SECTION 5. PRESSURE MAINTENANCE PLANT AND FACILITIES

(a) Participants hereby authorize and direct Operator to commence, within six (6) months after the effective date of this agreement, the installation of gas injection compressors or a gas injection plant for the control of pressure in the 27–B Pool, and to prosecute such work with due diligence to completion, subject to the provisions of section 29 hereof. Such gas injection compressors or such gas injection plant shall have a capacity, upon completion of installation, of not less than 15 million cubic feet of Residual Dry Gas per day, and shall be installed in accordance with plans and specifications and estimates of cost to be prepared by Operator and approved by Participants. A copy of such plans and specifications, as approved by Participants, shall be filed with the representative of the Secretary of the Navy upon his request.

(b) Within six (6) months after the effective date of this agreement Participants shall determine an initial plan and method for the control of pressure in the 27–B Pool, including the operation of the gas injection compressors or gas injection plant to be installed as provided in paragraph (a) of this section; and from time to time thereafter Participants shall modify, supplement or terminate such plan and method or determine additional or other plans and methods for the control of pressure in the 27–B Pool to obtain ultimately the economic maximum recovery of oil, gas and other hydrocarbons. Upon determination by Participants of each such plan and method, or modification, supplement or addition thereto or termination thereof, Operator shall diligently proceed to carry the same into effect or terminate the same (as the case may be) as instructed by Participants. A copy of each such plan and method, or modification, supplement or addition thereto, shall be filed with the representative of the Secretary of the Navy and such representative shall be notified of the termination of any such plan and method.

(c) Each Participant shall bear and pay its share, in accordance with its Participating Equity, of the cost of constructing, operating, maintaining, repairing, and enlarging a pressure maintenance plant or plants located within the Area, together with gathering lines within the Area to deliver Residual Dry Gas or other substances used for pressure maintenance to the pressure maintenance plant or plants after processing, and injection lines to points of injection, as determined by the Participants to be necessary, which shall be jointly-owned equipment and facilities.

SECTION 6. CENTRAL CRUDE OIL STORAGE FACILITIES

(a) The cost of constructing, operating, maintaining, and repairing all facilities which the Participants shall agree to be necessary or convenient for the storing, handling, collection, measurement, and delivery to central storage facilities of the crude oil produced pursuant to this agreement from the 27–B Pool shall be borne by each Participant in the proportion of its Participating Equity, and all such facilities shall be jointly-owned by the Participants in the proportions of their respective Participating Equities. The aforementioned central crude oil storage facilities shall be located at one or more central points, or at such other place as shall be determined by the Participants and shall be constructed, operated, maintained, and repaired by Operator, and the cost thereof paid currently by Participants in accordance with their Participating Equities. All the aforementioned facilities shall be so constructed and operated that each Participant shall receive, as its percentage share, crude oil of as nearly as practicable like quality and gravity.

(b) Each Participant shall accept in kind its Participating Equity share of the crude oil produced and saved and delivered into the central crude oil storage facilities, and at its own cost and expense shall provide all facilities for accepting delivery thereof from the central storage facilities, and shall make its own arrangements with the Operator to accept delivery thereof from such storage facilities. Such crude oil shall be divided in such manner that each Participant shall received crude oil of as nearly as practicable like quality and gravity to that received by the other Participants, and, if such division is impracticable, a method of making monthly adjustments to equalize the division of crude oil shall be agreed upon by Participants and placed in active operation by Operator.

(c) If Participants so elect, they may establish and revise at any time or from time to time a schedule of charges which shall be made against any Participant who, without having first obtained the consent of the other Participants, permits any portion of its share of crude oil to remain stored in the central crude oil storage facilities for a period in excess of fifteen (15) days. Any sum or sums so paid as storage charges shall be divided among the Participants in accordance with their respective Participating Equities.

(d) No Participant shall have any preferential right to purchase any portion of any other Participant's share of the crude oil produced, provided, however, that if at any time or times the share of any Participant of the total amount of crude oil then in the central crude oil storage facilities, shall exceed such Participant's share of the total amount of crude oil produced and saved and run into the central crude oil storage facilities during the preceding fifteen (15) days, the Operator shall notify such Participant to accept delivery from such central crude oil storage facilities of that portion of its share of the oil then in storage which exceeds its share of the total amount of crude oil produced and saved and run into the central storage facilities during the preceding fifteen (15) days. If within three (3) days after receipt of such notice, the Participant so notified shall not have accepted delivery from such central crude oil storage facilities of a quantity or quantities of crude oil sufficient to reduce its share of the crude oil then in such central crude oil storage facilities to an amount not in excess of its share of the total crude oil produced and saved and run into such central crude oil storage facilities during the preceding fifteen (15) days, the Operator shall have the right, and is hereby authorized by each Participant, to accept delivery from such central crude oil storage facilities for the account of the Participant so notified and to sell at the posted field price, for the account of such Participant, a quantity or quantities of crude oil sufficient to reduce such Participant's share of the crude oil then in storage to an amount not in excess of its share of the total oil produced and saved and run into such central crude oil storage facilities during the period of fifteen (15) days immediately preceding such delivery and sale.

SECTION 7. HANDLING OF GAS

(a) Each Participant shall take in kind its Participating Equity share of the wet gas produced and saved from the 27–B Pool and shall make its own arrangements for the processing for removal of liquid products from its share of wet gas so produced and saved. The wet gas so delivered to each Participant shall be as nearly as practicable of the same quality and liquid hydrocarbon content as that delivered to each of the other Participants.

(b) Each Participant shall arrange to return currently to Operator a quantity or quantities of gas equal to seventy-five percent (75%) of the volume of wet gas currently produced and saved from the 27–B Pool and delivered to such Participant for removal of liquid products. The gas so to be returned may be either Residual Dry Gas remaining after processing of wet gas produced from the 27–B Pool or any other dry gas of suitable quality, as determined by the Participants. The dry gas so returned to Operator shall be delivered within the Area into the injection plant intake lines or at the intake of the pressure maintenance plant or plants, at a pressure of not less than seventy (70) pounds per square inch; provided, however, that fur use as fuel in connection with any operation hereunder, Operator may take delivery of all or any part of such dry gas at the extraction plant or plants of any Participant or at any point on the intake line or lines between such extraction plant and the pressure maintenance plant.

(c) If at any time or from time to time the Participants determine that gas, in addition to that provided for in paragraph (b) of this section, or any other substance, is required for control of pressures in the 27–B Pool, Operator, for the joint account of the Participants, in the proportion of their respective Participating Equities, shall purchase such additional quantity or quantities of dry gas and/or other substances at a price not in excess of that authorized by Participants.

(d) Whenever mechanical difficulties prevent the injection of Residual Dry Gas, or if the Participants at any time or times determine that the division of Residual Dry Gas will not adversely affect the accomplishment of the purposes of this agreement, such Residual Dry Gas need not be returned to Operator for injection.

(e) If any gas is injected into the 27–B Pool which was not originally produced therefrom, then gas produced and sold during the term of this agreement, but not thereafter, shall be deemed to be that injected gas on a last in first out basis, and (a) if such gas is injected currently pursuant to paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section 7 in substitution for Residual Dry Gas of any Participants upon which royalty is paid, no royalty shall accrue or be paid on gas allocated to and sold by such Participant (except royalty on products extracted therefrom) unless and until there shall be allocated to and sold by such Participant a quantity of gas equal to one hundred percent (100%) of the amount of such substitute gas, and (b) if such gas is not injected as substitute gas, no royalty shall accrue or be paid on gas allocated to and sold by the Participant furnishing such gas (except royalty on products extracted therefrom) unless and until there shall be allocated to and sold by such Participant a quantity of gas equal to eighty-seven and one-half percent (87½%) of the amount of such injected gas.

SECTION 8. WELLS, EQUIPMENT AND FACILITIES

(a) On the effective date of this agreement each Participant shall deliver to Operator exclusive possession of all its wells which have theretofore been completed in the 27–B Pool and which are capable of producing oil, gas, gasoline, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool, and such other wells then completed in the 27–B Pool as Participants shall determine are or will be required for operations hereunder. Each well capable of producing which is so delivered to Operator shall be equipped with proper equipment, including well valves and control equipment for the operation thereof in accordance with good oil field practice, and shall also be equipped with artificial lifting equipment if the same is required for proper operation of such well. The equipment so to be delivered to Operator shall not include any oil or gas well derricks. Any additional wells within the Area which on the effective date of this agreement are being drilled by any Participant and which are thereafter completed in the 27–B Pool and which are or become capable of producing oil, gas, gasoline, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool, shall, upon their completion, be also delivered with proper equipment to the exclusive possession of Operator for operation thereof.

(b) On the effective date of this agreement, each Participant shall deliver to Operator exclusive possession of such equipment and facilities as are necessary and proper for the normal operation of the wells delivered to Operator by such Participant, and for segregating from other production and normal handling on the property of such Participant all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons produced from such wells, all as determined by Participants. Such equipment and facilities shall be fully installed and in good operating condition and working order, and at the time of delivery to Operator shall be adequate to segregate from other production and to handle on the property of such Participant all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons currently produced from the wells delivered to Operator by such Participant. Delivery of such equipment and facilities shall be accomplished by presentation to Operator of an inventory containing a complete description of such equipment and of its location.

The equipment and facilities so to be delivered to Operator shall not include any facilities which are used by any Participant for storage or removal of oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons from the field, or any drilling equipment, camps, yards, warehouse stocks, gasoline extraction plants, or any equipment or facilities used exclusively in connection with production from a sand or zone other than those which are herein defined as comprising the 27–B Pool.

(c) It is recognized that certain items of equipment and facilities located upon the lands of the respective Participants are used not only in producing the 27–B Pool and handling production therefrom, but are also used in producing and handling production from zones or sands other than the 27–B Pool. Such circumstance shall not relieve any Participant from the obligation set forth in paragraph (b) of this section to deliver to the Operator, on the effective date of this agreement, such equipment and facilities as are necessary and proper for the normal operation of the wells delivered to Operator by such Participant, and for the segregation from other production and normal handling on the property of such Participant of all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons produced from such wells. Each Participant who is the owner of equipment and facilities which are used for producing and handling production from both the 27–B Pool and other zones or sands may, at its election, retain all or any part or parts of the equipment or facilities so used, and, prior to the effective date of this agreement, replace the same with, or substitute therefor, such other equipment and facilities as shall be necessary and proper for operation of those wells which are to be delivered by it to Operator pursuant to this agreement, and for segregating from other production and handling on the property of such Participant all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons produced from such wells.

(d) During the first two (2) years after the effective date of this agreement, except as provided in paragraph (f) of this section, the Participants shall not authorize the drilling of any wells to the 27–B Pool at the joint expense of the Participants, unless all Participants shall agree thereto; provided, however, that during such two (2) year period, any Participant owning lands or operating rights upon lands which have been made subject to this agreement, at its own cost and expense, and at any location at which a well might be drilled in accordance with the well-spacing pattern for the 27–B Pool, as shown on the plat attached hereto, marked Exhibit "E" and made a part hereof, may drill an additional well or wells for the purpose of producing oil, gas, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool. If any well or wells so drilled by any Participant shall be capable of producing oil, gas, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool, then, upon completion thereof, the owner of such well or wells, without charge to the Participants for the cost of drilling, completing, and equipping such well or wells, shall deliver to Operator exclusive possession of such well or wells and of such equipment and facilities as shall be necessary and proper for the normal operation thereof and for segregating from other production and handling on the property of such Participant all oil, gas, gasoline, and other hydrocarbons produced and saved from the 27–B Pool by or through such well or wells.

(e) After two (2) years after the effective date of this agreement, the Participants hereunder may elect to drill and equip additional wells within the Area for production of oil, gas, gasoline, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool. In such event any such well or wells shall be drilled by Operator at a location or locations agreed upon by Participants, and the cost and expense of all wells so agreed upon and so drilled shall be borne by all Participants hereunder in the proportion of their respective Participating Equities. Except with respect to the drilling and equipping during the first two (2) years after the effective date of this agreement of additional wells for the purpose of producing through such wells oil, gas, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool, the provisions of this paragraph (e) shall not be deemed or construed to prohibit or restrict in any way or at any time the right of Operator hereunder, subject to all the other terms and provisions of this agreement, to redrill, deepen, repair, or rework any well or wells or to perform any of the acts or duties or to exercise any of the rights which pertain to Operator hereunder.

(f) At any time or times after the effective date of this agreement, the Participants hereunder may elect to drill and equip additional wells within the Area for the purpose of injecting gas or other substances into the 27–B Pool, or the Participants may elect to repair, alter, or convert to an injection well any well or wells theretofore drilled to the 27–B Pool on any lands subject to this agreement. In such event any such well or wells shall be drilled and equipped, or repaired, altered, or converted by Operator, and the cost and expense of such operation shall be borne by all Participants hereunder in the proportion of their respective Participating Equities.

(g) If, pursuant to section 4 of this agreement, the Area shall be enlarged to include additional lands, or if any lands within the area which were not made subject to this agreement on the effective date thereof are thereafter made subject hereto, the owners or lessees of such lands, without charge to the Participants hereunder for the cost of drilling, completing, and equipping the well or wells which are located upon such lands and which are capable of producing oil, gas, gasoline, or other hydrocarbons from the 27–B Pool, shall deliver to Operator exclusive possession of such well or wells and shall also deliver to Operator exclusive possession of such equipment and facilities, including well valves, control equipment, and artificial lifting equipment, if the same is required, as shall be necessary and proper for the normal operation of such well or wells and for segregating from other production and handling on the property of such Participant all oil, gas, gasoline, and other hydrocarbons produced and saved from the 27–B Pool by or through such well or wells.

(h) All the wells, equipment, and facilities delivered to the exclusive possession of Operator in accordance with paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), and (g) of this section 8, and all wells drilled and equipped pursuant to paragraphs (e) and (f) hereof, shall be "jointly-owned equipment and facilities" and each Participant shall own an undivided interest in all such jointly-owned equipment and facilities equivalent to its Participating Equity.

(i) At such time as any additional plants, facilities, or equipment are acquired or installed upon the participating lands at the joint expense of the Participants, such additional plants, facilities, and equipment shall become jointly-owned equipment and facilities, and each Participant shall own an undivided interest therein equivalent to its Participating Equity.

SECTION 9. DIVISION AND PAYMENT OF OPERATING COSTS

(a) Subject to all the terms, conditions, and limitations of this agreement, and in the manner and proportions herein set out, each Participant agrees and obligates itself to pay its share, in accordance with its Participating Equity, of all costs and expenses incurred by Operator during each month incident to the development and operation of the 27–B Pool, including (but not by way of limitation) all costs and expense of drilling, testing, completing, reworking and equipping wells, pursuant to the provisions of paragraphs (e) and (f) of section 8 of this agreement; and all costs and expenses incurred in operating and in producing and saving oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons from wells subject to this agreement; and all costs and expense incurred in planning, erecting, constructing, equipping, and operating the central crude-oil storage facilities and the pressure maintenance plant or plants and injection lines appurtenant thereto, and in returning gas or other substances to the formations.

(b) All costs and expense for development and operations shall be accounted for in accordance with the Accounting Procedure.

(c) To secure the payment of any indebtedness owing from any Participant to Operator under the terms of this agreement, Operator is hereby granted a lien upon the interest of each defaulting Participant in the pressure maintenance plant and system, and upon the interest of the defaulting Participant in all oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons produced at any time from the Area, except so much thereof as shall be necessary to satisfy the current royalty obligations of such Participant under any lease or contract affecting lands within the Area. The Operator may enforce collection of such indebtedness by foreclosure of the lien at any time after there has been a default in payment for more than thirty (30) days. In addition to the right to foreclose the lien, the Operator shall also have the right to withhold from delivery to such Participant and to segregate and sell for the best price obtainable in the open market such quantity or quantities, not in excess of the share of such Participant, of oil and other hydrocarbons produced hereunder (except gas), as shall be sufficient to pay the amount of such indebtedness, and shall also have the right to bring any action or proceedings to enforce collection of such amounts without foreclosure and sale. If within six (6) months following the date of any such delinquency, Operator shall have been unable to secure reimbursement for such indebtedness in the manner above provided, each Participant shall contribute to the reimbursement of Operator for the amount of such delinquency in the ratio which such Participant's interest bears to the aggregate interests of all Participants (excepting the interest of the defaulting Participant) and shall thereupon be proportionately subrogated to Operator's rights under this paragraph. If the defaulting Participant is a lessee of the United States the Operator shall promptly advise the designated representative of the Secretary of the Navy and of any action contemplated by it.

(d) It is recognized that after the effective date of this agreement expenditures of large sums of money during each calendar month in connection with construction, operation, maintenance, and repair of central crude-oil storage facilities and pressure maintenance plant or plants will be necessary and, accordingly, Operator, at its election, may require the Participants to advance their respective proportions of all estimated costs in accordance with the following conditions: On or before the end of each quarter of the calendar year, Operator shall submit to Participants for their approval an itemized statement of such estimated costs for the succeeding quarter, which approval or disapproval shall be made within fifteen (15) days after receipt of such estimate by Participants. If any Participant fails to notify Operator of its disapproval of such estimate within the time herein specified, it shall be conclusively presumed that such Participant has approved such estimate. If a Participant disapproves such estimate, a meeting of Participants shall be called by Operator and Participants shall thereupon determine and approve a proper estimate. Within fifteen (15) days thereafter each Participant shall pay to Operator such Participant's Participating Equity share of such estimate.

SECTION 10. DESIGNATION OF OPERATOR

(a) Standard Oil Company of California is hereby designated as Operator for a period of twenty-four (24) months and thereafter until it resigns as such or is removed by Participants as hereinafter provided.

(b) Operator shall have the right to resign as Operator, which resignation shall become effective six (6) months after written notice to Participants of such resignation; and within the six (6) months' period the Participants shall select one of the other Participants as Operator. If, pursuant to paragraph (a) of this section 10, Participants shall elect to remove Operator, such Operator shall receive from Participants six (6) months' written notice of its removal. Participants shall then select a new Operator, who shall continue as Operator for a period of eighteen (18) months and thereafter until six (6) months after written notice to it by Participants of the selection of one of the other Participants as Operator. The Secretary of the Navy shall be notified promptly in writing of any contemplated change of Operator.

SECTION 11. DUTIES OF OPERATOR

Operator shall perform all the acts and operations which are expressly charged or confided to it by this agreement and, with respect only to the 27–B Pool, shall do and perform such other acts and operations as shall be necessary and proper to comply with the lessees' obligations under U. S. Government oil and gas leases, as amended and conformed to this agreement, except as otherwise provided in sections 16 and 17 hereof.

Operator shall have full and complete control over the construction, operation, maintenance and repair of the central crude oil storage facilities and the pressure maintenance plant or plants in all matters not specifically reserved for determination by Participants.

Subject to the directions and instructions of Participants, and in accordance herewith, Operator, in addition to the matters hereinbefore set forth, shall perform such other acts and operations (except such as are expressly reserved to Participants by this agreement) as shall be necessary or convenient for development, maintenance, and operation of the 27–B Pool, including (but not by way of limitation) the drilling and equipping of development and/or injection wells authorized by this agreement; the performance of repairs, maintenance, and remedial work upon all wells subject to this agreement; the construction, installation, operation, repair and maintenance of plants and facilities on lands subject hereto for pressure maintenance by use of gas or other substances, or for gas recycling; the installation, operation, repair, and maintenance of jointly-owned pumps, warehouses, buildings, water development and disposal systems, power and telephone lines, pipe and gathering and distributing lines and storage facilities within the Area, and the abandonment and dismantling of development wells and other jointly-owned plants, facilities, and equipment on lands subject to this agreement.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (a) of this section 11, within ten (10) days after receipt from Operator of any advance estimate of costs and expenditures for the drilling of any well or wells or for construction of any plant or other facilities of a permanent nature, any Participant may submit a contract bid, either for its own account or for a financially responsible contractor regularly engaged in the business, for the performance of such work. If any submitted contract bid is less than the cost estimated by Operator, then Operator shall drill such well or perform such other work at the lowest submitted bid or enter into a contract therefor with the person submitting the lowest bid.

SECTION 12. DEVELOPMENT OF OTHER ZONES

(a) This agreement shall affect only the 27–B Pool and nothing herein shall be construed as affecting or in any manner relating to interests, rights, or obligations in any formation or strata underlying the Area other than the 27–B Pool.

(b) Each Participant, upon lands of which it is the lessee or owner, shall have the right to develop and produce oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons from zones or strata other than the 27–B Pool, together with the right to occupy and use the surface of such lands for any and all purposes not inconsistent with this agreement, which use of the surface by such Participant shall be so limited as not to interfere with the well-spacing pattern for the 27–B Pool. In drilling any well through the 27–B Pool, or in deepening, abandoning, plugging back, or completing in the 27–B Pool any well which has been drilled through such pool, each Participant agrees to take such steps as shall be designated by Participants for the purpose of protecting the 27–B Pool, or, if the Participant effecting such operations is for any reason not willing to adopt the specific measures designated by Participants, the protective measures proposed by a majority of the Participants and those proposed by the Participant effecting such operations shall be referred to the Division of Oil and Gas of the Department of Natural Resources of the State of California, and the decision of that Division shall be conclusive of the matter so decided, provided that with respect to lands of the United States all applicable requirements of the Operating Regulations must be complied with in any event.

(c) Upon election by Participants to abandon any jointly owned well or wells, or upon determination by Participants that any such well has ceased to be of value for the operations contemplated by this agreement, the Participant upon whose lands any such well is located shall have the right, within fifteen (15) days after written notice of such election or determination, to elect to take over such well for any purpose not inconsistent with or detrimental to the operation under this agreement.

If any Participant shall elect to take over any well or wells theretofore delivered to Operator pursuant to the provisions of paragraphs (a) or (d) of section 8 hereof, no charge shall be made to such Participant for such well or for or on account of the salvage value of its casing or other equipment. In the case of any well or wells drilled and equipped at the joint cost and expense of Participants hereunder, the Participant so taking over the same shall pay to each of the other Participants its Participating Equity share of the reasonable salvage value, which shall be determined as provided in the Accounting Procedure, of the casing and other equipment of such well or wells.

Upon election by any Participant to take over any jointly owned well as aforesaid, each of the other Participants shall transfer and assign all its interest therein to such Participant, and such Participant at its sole cost and expense shall take such steps as shall be designated by Participants for the purpose of protecting the 27-B Pool.

SECTION 13. DETERMINATIONS BY PARTICIPANTS

(a) Except as otherwise provided herein, all questions arising hereunder and determinations made hereunder shall be resolved and/or made by affirmative agreement of at least four (4) of the Participants representing in the aggregate not less than eighty-seven and one-half percent (87.5%) of the total Participating Equities under this agreement, and all matters so resolved or so agreed upon or consented to shall be binding upon all the Participants.

(b) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this agreement, and without prejudice to the right to the Participants to remove Operator by affirmative agreement in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (a) of this section, Operator may be removed at any time by the unanimous agreement of all Participants, except Operator and any other Participants the greater part of whose stock is owned or controlled by Operator or which own or control the greater part of the stock of Operator.

(c) Meetings of representatives of Participants shall be held in the offices of Operator, unless some other meeting place shall be designated by Participants.

SECTION 14. ADMINISTRATION OF OPERATIONS

Subject to the limitations set forth in this agreement, Participants shall:

(a) Decide all matters relating to removal and replacement of Operator designated in section 10 hereof; provided, that upon any proposed removal of Operator, Participant then acting as Operator shall be given written notice of the action of Participants in electing to remove such Operator at least six (6) months prior to such removal.

(b) Determine a plan and method for the control of pressures in the 27–B Pool and determine the exact nature and size of any plants, facilities, and equipment to be installed to effectuate such control of pressures and the method of operation thereof, subject, however, to the provisions of section 5 hereof.

(c) Determine at any time and from time to time whether measures other han or in addition to those contemplated by section 5 of this agreement shall be dopted in order to obtain the maximum economic recovery of crude oil from ie 27–B Pool.

(d) Determine the nature, size, locations, and method of operation of the ntral crude oil storage facilities or other arrangements for handling such crude il and determine the method of division of the crude oil among the Participants accordance with their Participating Equities in such manner that each Parcipant shall receive crude oil of as nearly as practicable like quality and gravity that of the other Participants.

(e) Determine, on the basis of good oil field practices, rates of production from ie 27–B Pool, the particular wells from which crude oil and wet gas shall be oduced, the rates of such production, and the particular wells which shall be ed for injection purposes. Production from the 27–B Pool shall be maintained the maximum good operating rates, as determined by Participants from time time in accordance with sound oil field engineering and production practices, as to endeavor to obtain the maximum economic recovery of crude oil from ie pool: provided that the average daily rate of oil production per month shall ot be less than 15,000 barrels per day during the first two (2) years after the fective date hereof, and shall thereafter be not less than the average daily rate termined for each year by Participants. If Participants are unable to agree on the average daily rate of oil production for any year after the first two (2) ars, such production shall be maintained at the average daily rate determined r the previous year until such time as Participants are able to so agree.

(f) Determine from time to time the quantities of gas or other substances quired to be injected to control pressures in the 27–B Pool, and, if additional antities of gas or other substances are needed at any time for control of pres ires, determine the amounts to be acquired and the terms and conditions upon hich the Operator shall be authorized to purchase and inject such additional uantities of gas or other substances.

(g) Determine from time to time whether the diversion of Residual Dry Gas ill adversely affect the accomplishment of the purposes of this agreement.

(h) Determine the extent of drilling operations necessary for the proper de elopment and operation of the 27–B Pool.

(i) Pass upon and approve or disapprove: (1) Operator's advance estimate of sts and expenditures, as provided in section 9 (d) hereof; and (2) any proposed penditure of Operator, other than those provided in section 9 (d) hereof, for y item in excess of Fifteen Thousand Dollars ($15,000).

(j) Pass upon and approve or disapprove the proposed sale and disposition of intly-owned surplus materials and equipment by Operator.

(k) Compromise or effect settlements of material overages and shortages at ne of inventories.

(l) Meet at least quarterly at the call of Operator, provided that any Partici ant may call a meeting of Participants upon the failure of the Operator to do so.

(m) Determine any additional matter required by any other provision of this greement, or necessary or proper in accomplishing the objectives of this agreement.

SECTION 15. DETERMINATION OF RATES OF PRODUCTION

The rates of production from the 27–B Pool shall be determined by Participants provided in paragraph (e) of section 14. If at any time, the Secretary of the avy (or his designated representative) shall be of the opinion that the rates of roduction, so fixed by Participants, are not fixed in accordance with sound and fficient oil-field practices to obtain ultimately the economic maximum recovery f oil, gas and associated hydrocarbons, the Secretary of the Navy may serve pon Operator a notice in writing stating: (a) the rates of production which in is opinion would, in accordance with sound and efficient oil-field practices and far as consistent with proper conservation of the natural resources of the 27-B ool without requiring the drilling of additional wells or the installation of addi ional facilities, result in a greater economic maximum recovery of oil, gas and ssociated hydrocarbons than the rates so fixed by Participants, and (b) the actual data and engineering principles upon which such opinion is based; and within sixty (60) days after Operator shall have received such notice, Partici ants and the designated representative of the Secretary of the Navy shall not ave agreed upon rates of production for the ensuing period of not less than welve (12) months, the Secretary may demand, by notice in writing served upon he Operator for and in behalf of Participants, that such rates of production be etermined by arbitration. Such notice shall designate the arbitrator selected by the Secretary of the Navy. Within thirty (30) days after receipt of suc notice by Operator the Participants shall, by notice in writing served upon th designated representative of the Secretary of the Navy, designate the arbitrato selected by them. The two (2) arbitrators so selected shall within thirty (30 days select a third disinterested arbitrator. Thereafter, the three (3) arbitrator shall give thirty (30) days written notice to Operator and the Secretary of th Navy of a time and place of hearing at which evidence and argument may b presented by Participants and the Secretary of the Navy. Within sixty (60 days after the conclusion of such hearing, the arbitrators shall determine b majority vote the rates of production for the period of twelve (12) months follow ing the expiration of fifteen (15) days after such decision is served upon the Op erator and the designated representative of the Secretary of the Navy, which, i accordance with and without considering factors other than sound and efficien oil-field practices, and so far as consistent with proper conservation of the natura resources of the 27–B Pool without requiring the drilling of additional wells o the installation of additional facilities, will result ultimately in the economi maximum recovery of oil, gas and associated hydrocarbons, and the authorit of the arbitrators shall be limited to the determination of such rates of production The determination of the arbitrators within the scope of such authority shall b binding upon all parties to this agreement including the United States and holder of royalty interests; provided, however, that such determination may be change at any time by agreement of Participants and the designated representative o the Secretary of the Navy. Each arbitrator shall have at least ten (10) year experience as a petroleum engineer, or if a graduate engineer, at least five (5 years experience as a petroleum engineer. All reasonable costs and expenses o the arbitration shall be paid by Operator and charged to the common account o the Participants hereunder. In no event shall the rates of production fixed pur suant to this section 15 exceed the fair and proper share of the allowable produc tion for the State of California under any system prescribed by applicable law s long as such system is not set aside, or to the extent that it is not modified by an order of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Digitized by Google

SECTION 16. RENTALS, ROYALTIES, AND LEASE OBLIGATIONS

Each Participant agrees to pay all rentals, royalties, overriding royalties and other payments which pertain to or affect lands subject to this agreement and which may be or become payable pursuant to any lease or other agreement to which it is a party, and further agrees (except as to those obligations expressly charged or confided to Operator hereunder) to do and perform, or to cause to be done and performed, such other acts and operations as shall be necessary and sufficient to maintain in good standing and free from breach or default any and all leases and other agreements to which it is a party and which relate to or affect lands subject to this agreement.

In the event that any Participant shall fail to make any such payment when due, and if the failure to make such payment shall constitute a default permitting termination or forfeiture of the leasehold right of such Participant in or to any lands which have been made subject hereto, the other Participants, at their election, may make such payment for and on behalf of the defaulting Participant and shall be entitled to reimbursement therefor by such defaulting Participant plus interest at the rate of seven percent (7%) per annum from the date of such payment.

SECTION 17. GOVERNMENT ROYALTIES

The royalty and rental obligations of the respective lessees of the United States are hereby modified and established as follows:

(a) Upon the crude oil produced from the 27–B Pool which is allocated to lands of the United States pursuant to this agreement, royalty payable to the United States shall be computed and paid in cash or delivered in kind at the rate of twelve and nine-tenths percent (12.9%).

(b) Upon all gas and hydrocarbon substance other than crude oil produced from the 27–B Pool which are allocated to lands of the United States pursuant to this agreement, but subject, nevertheless, to paragraph (e) of section 7, royalty payable to the United States shall be computed and paid in cash or delivered in kind at the rates specified in the respective leases of such lands and for such purpose the gas produced and sold from all zones or pools other than the 27–B Pool and the gas allocated to lands of the United States pursuant to this agreement and sold shall be aggregated to determine the average production of gas per day; provided, however, that royalty on natural gasoline, butane, propane and ther liquid hydrocarbon substances extracted from gas shall be computed on the asis of thirty-three and one-third percent (33⅓%) only of such substances, the emaining sixty-six and two-thirds percent (66⅔%) being an allowance for the ost of manufacture upon which no royalty shall be paid.

(c) A minimum royalty of $1.00 per acre of each Government Lease, any art of which is subject to this agreement, shall be payable to the United States, i lieu of rental, at the expiration of each lease year beginning on or after the fective date of this agreement.

(d) Nothing contained in this agreement shall operate to relieve the lessees of ie United States from the royalty and rental obligations of their respective leases ; such royalty and rental obligations are modified and established by this greement.

SECTION 18. TAXES

Each Participant shall prepare and file its returns with the proper taxing authorities covering mineral rights assessments pertaining to such Participant's lands in ie Area, and shall also prepare and file its returns covering all real estate, improvements and personal property solely owned by it and located within the rea. Each Participant hereto shall pay, or cause to be paid, to the proper axing authorities all mineral rights taxes levied or assessed against its tracts of nd, and taxes on its solely-owned improvements and personal property, and hall furnish to the other Participants a written statement of the amount of such ineral rights taxes levied or assessed and payments thereon. Operator shall repare and file returns with the proper taxing authorities covering the assessments n all jointly-owned improvements and personal property. Operator shall pay cause to be paid, to the proper taxing authorities, all taxes levied or assessed gainst such jointly-owned improvements and personal property. Operator hall make a calculation of the aggregate amount of mineral rights taxes pertaining to the 27–B Pool underlying lands subject to this agreement which have been levied and assessed, together with the aggregate amount of the taxes levied, ssessed and paid relating to the jointly-owned equipment and facilities, and the ggregate amount so calculated annually shall be apportioned among the Parcipants in the ratio of the Participating Equities as of the first Monday in March f each year commencing March 1949, or as of any other date that the State hall adopt as the date for the assessment of property for tax purposes. In the vent that the mineral rights taxes, which pertain to the 27–B Pool, and which re levied, assessed, and paid as to a Participant's tracts of land, are in excess of n amount equivalent to its Participating Equity percentage of the total amount f all such taxes, such Participant shall be entitled to reimbursement for such xcess by such other Participants who shall have paid or caused to be paid an mount of such taxes less than their Participating Equity percentages thereof. ach Participant shall reimburse Operator for taxes paid on jointly-owned improvements and personal property in the same ratio as their Participating Equity s of the first Monday in March, 1949, or as of any other date that the State shall dopt as the date for the assessment of property for tax purposes.

Operator shall pay, for and on behalf of Participants, all taxes and assessments n or measured by the production of 27–B Pool oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons om lands subject to this agreement, including the State Petroleum and Gas Fund ssessment, and shall include the payment of such taxes and assessments in perator's statements to Participants.

The several Participants may collect from their respective lessors and royalty wners (other than the United States), by deduction from royalties or otherwise, he share of taxes for which such lessors or royalty owners are or may hereafter e liable under any lease or agreement made by or with them, without accounting herefor to Operator or the other Participants.

SECTION 19. LIMITATION ON LIABILITY

(a) Each Participant shall be responsible to the other Participants for only its bligations, as set forth herein, and shall be liable to the other Participants only or its proportionate share of costs and expenses, as provided herein.

(b) The Operator shall not be liable for the result of any errors of judgment r for the loss of or damage to any jointly-owned property or equipment not esulting from the gross negligence or willful misconduct of Operator or its mployees.

(c) Each Participant fully releases all other Participants from any and all damage because of disturbance of reservoir conditions in the 27–B Pool resulting rom, or which may have resulted from, operations pursuant to this agreement, or which may be claimed upon the ground that operations under the provisions hereof have resulted in, or will result in, a loss in ultimate recovery of oil, gas, or other hydrocarbons from such Participant's leases or lands in the 27–B Pool.

SECTION 20. EFFECTIVE DATE OR AGREEMENT

This agreement shall become effective on the first day of the first calendar month which commences not less than ten (10) days after all of the following events shall have occurred:

(a) Execution of this agreement by all the owners and lessees of lands described in Exhibit "B" hereof; and

(b) Approval of this agreement by the State Oil and Gas Supervisor, pursuant to the provisions of Section 3301 of the Public Resources Code of the State of California; and

(c) Approval of this agreement by the Secretary of the Navy of the United States of America with the consent of the President, pursuant to the Acts of Congress referred to in Recital 8 hereof.

SECTION 21. TERM

This agreement upon becoming effective, as provided in section 20, shall continue in full force and effect as long as oil, gas, natural gasoline and/or associated hydrocarbons can be produced hereunder from the 27–B Pool in commercially paying quantities; provided, however, that this agreement may be terminated prior to such expiration date by unanimous consent of all Participants and the Secretary of the Navy.

SECTION 22. WARRANTIES

(a) Each Participant warrants and represents that as of the effective date hereof such Participant has not transferred, conveyed, hypothecated, or otherwise disposed of any part of its lands or lease-hold estates as described in Exhibit "B" hereof, or any interest therein

(b) Each Participant warrants and represents that as of the effective date hereof it is not party to any contract or agreement for the sale, disposal, processing or treatment of oil, gas, natural gasoline and/or associated hydrocarbons which may be produced and saved from the 27–B Pool by or through wells drilled on its lands other than such Participant's Participating Equity share thereof as provided in this agreement.

SECTION 23. RELATIONSHIP OF PARTICIPANTS

It is the intent of each Participant executing this agreement to establish Operator as agent of such Participant for the sole purpose of developing and operating the 27–B Pool to the extent herein set forth.

SECTION 24. COVENANTS TO RUN WITH LAND

All the terms, covenants, provisions, and conditions contained in this agreement are expressly agreed to be for the direct benefit of each tract of land described in Exhibit "B" hereof, and are made by each of the Participants on behallf of its successors and assigns for the benefit of the tracts of land of each of the other Participants and for the benefit of the other Participants, and their successors and assigns, and are intended to run with all of said lands during the life of this agreement. All rights and obligations of the Participants shall inure to the benefit of and shall likewise be assumed by the successors and assigns of the respective Participants.

SECTION 25. GOVERNMENT LEASES

(a) The Operating Regulations, effective June 1, 1942, 30 C. F. R., Part 221, but no amendment thereof not accepted in writing by all Participants, shall be and remain the applicable operating regulations with respect to the leases of lands of the United States; provided, however, that if any provision of this agreement is inconsistent with or in conflict with any such regulation, then such provision of this agreement shall prevail, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the provisions of this agreement relating to the rates of production, the number and location of wells to be drilled for production or injection, the plan and method for the control of pressure in the 27–B Pool, and providing for the prevention of waste as set forth in section 1 shall supersede such regulations, but, nevertheless, one of the rights and powers specified in section 14 shall be deemed to modify, strict or curtail the duties, functions and responsibilities of the designated representative of the Secretary of the Navy with respect to operations on lands of the nited States under sections 221.8, 221.9, 221.11, 221.20 (a), 221.21 to and including 221.34 and 221.37 of such regulations, and those regulations must be complied ith in any event; and provided, further, that with respect to the determination value of production for computation of royalty payable to the United States, e contractual obligations and rights of the lessees and of the United States, as such ntractual obligations and rights exist under and pursuant to the Plan-Agreement, ated October 1, 1935, (identified in Recital 3 of this agreement), shall not be odified or abridged by such regulations.

(b) The Participants, and each of them, who are the lessees under U. S. Government leases of lands within the Area, consent that the Secretary of the Navy all, and the Secretary, by his approval of this agreement, does hereby modify id amend each of such leases to conform to this agreement and consents and grees that during the term hereof the prospecting, drilling, and producing operaons of Operator upon any lands subject hereto, pursuant to the provisions of is agreement, shall constitute operations under and for the benefit of all such ases, and that no lease shall be deemed to expire by reason of failure to operate produce from wells on lands embraced therein; and each and all of such leases e hereby extended to continue in force and effect for and during the life of this greement, insofar as they relate to or affect the 27–B Pool.

(c) The Participants who are parties to the agreements referred to in Recitals 3 id 4 of this agreement, or either thereof, agree each with the other, and the ecretary of the Navy by his approval of this agreement does hereby agree, (i) that uring the term of this agreement the agreements referred to in Recitals 3 and 4 this agreement shall be suspended with respect to the 27–B Pool, (ii) that upon e termination of this agreement for any reason whatsoever the agreements reerred to in Recitals 3 and 4 of this agreement shall be again in full force and ffect with respect to the 27–B Pool, and (iii) that no act or deed done or omitted o be done in the performance of this agreement shall ever be, or be construed to e, a default by any person in the performance, or a breach of any term, covenant r condition, of any of the agreements referred to in Recitals 3 and 4 of this greement

SECTION 26. RIGHT OF INSPECTION

Each Participant shall have the following specific rights and privileges:

(a) Access to any land within the Area at all reasonable times to inspect the ork of development and operation hereunder.

(b) The right to inspect the logs, samples, and cuttings from any and all wells rilled hereunder.

(c) The right to inspect and audit the Operator's books, records, and invoices ertaining to any matter of accounting arising hereunder, not more than once ach calendar month, by an experienced auditor or accountant representing all Participants desiring to make such inspection and audit. Each Participant shall ikewise have the right, not more than once each month, to inspect and audit the ooks, records, and invoices of each other Participant, pertaining to any matter f accounting arising hereunder.

(d) The right to inspect any agreement or document affecting the 27–B Pool hich is in the custody of Operator and which relates to operations hereunder.

SECTION 27. REPORTS AND RECORDS

Operator shall furnish Participants with copies of logs of all wells hereafter drilled by Operator into the 27–B Pool, and upon request of the Participants, shall furnish the Participants with daily drilling reports. Operator shall also furnish Participants with monthly reports showing the status of developments and operations and the amount and character of production therefrom.

SECTION 28. NOTICES

Any notice required or permitted to be given by a Participant to any other Participant may be given by the delivery or mailing of a copy thereof to such other Participant. Notices shall be complete forty-eight (48) hours after the date of mailing or delivery. The addresses appearing after the respective signatures to this agreement shall be the addresses to which notices shall be mailed or delivered to the Participants. Any Participant may change its address by a notice to all the other Participants.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, have you had a hearing on this in the Senate?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir. The Senate committee has dicated their approval of it. And Mr. Harlow just handed you the ter from Mr. Tydings.

The CHAIRMAN. Let it go in the record. Read the letter, Mr. arlow.

Mr. HARLOW (reading):

My DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is to advise that the Senate Committee on med Services places no objections to the unit agreement for the 27–B pool of e Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2, Kern unty, Calif., as transmitted by your letter of February 2.

Sincerely yours,

M. E. TYDINGS, Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Commodore, briefly give to the committee what benefits accrue to the Government by entering into this unit contract?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir. I believe that each member has before him a table which analyzes the effect of this agreement to the advantage of the Government——

The CHAIRMAN. Before you do that, give the committee a little background. Some of the members do not fully understand the situation. Give the historical background of the Buean Vista field and who the unit contract is entered into with and who own the lands and all the details.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. And also, Mr. Chairman, the basis of their authority to enter into these contracts.

Commodore GREENMAN. May I answer that, sir? That is included in the letter from the Judge Advocate General to the Secretary, which is a part of this record.

Mr. RIVERS. I just was talking about it for the benefit of the new members.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead and briefly now tell us.

Commodore GREENMAN. Public Law 343, that was approved on the 17th of June 1944, authorized the Secretary of the Navy to enter into unit agreements with private interests in the naval petroleum reserves in order to protect the oil that was contained therein from drainage to wells on adjacent private lands. That is the substance of the act as far as unitization is concerned.

This [pointing to a map] is a sectional map showing the outline of Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 2, which is indicated by the blue line. The area within this reserve affected by this 27–B pool agreement is indicated by this heavy black line inside.

The red line, farther in, indicates the actual aerial extent of the pool as it is now known.

The situation in the field is hypothetically represented here. This is a cross section across the anticline. This is a dome structure, as you will visualize it, and we have made a hypothetical cross section across the middle of the field. This shows the various oil sands that are now producing in the field. This field was discovered in 1910. That was before any of the leases of Government land in this reserve were made.

Wells were drilled into those oil sands from the private properties adjoining Navy land, and the wells were draining the Navy's oil before we reached the point where we had the necessary authority to make leases. The first leases were made in 1919 and the 9 or 10 of them that are involved in the property now under consideration were concluded between 1919 and 1921.

The first sand discovered in this field was this shallow sand that is indicated here. The red at the top of the cross section indicates a gas cap in each instance, the black, the oil and the green, at the bottom is the water. Each one of these sands was discovered consecutively as they drilled deeper into the field, until in 1944 they got down to the lowest, to what is called the 27–B sand [indicating the lowest sand]. The name of 27–B is because it was found on section 27 of that township which is designated by the letter B.

At the time the field was discovered pressures in each of the sands of ne field were equalized by a gas cap at the top and by water pressure the bottom. As soon as the wells were drilled into this field ressures were disturbed. The oil produced with the result that gas solution was released from the oil, causing the gas cap to expand, id at the same time permitted the water to encroach further up ructure driving the oil ahead. The wells which were located at the est of the structure and those wells located on the flanks were nsequently so located that they produced less oil and more gas and the case of the wells on the crest; and more water and less oil in the se of those on the flank. That is the general picture.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the depth of that sand, sir?

Commodore GREENMAN. This sand is 3,900 feet.

Mr. RIVERS. Is that the top one?

Commodore GREENMAN. This one. The most shallow sand is found 2,000 feet in this field, the next one at 3,000 feet—down in here—d this one, the 27–B pool, between 3,600 and 3,900 feet. Now that the hypothetical situation in the field.

Now I will endeavor to show you where the leases are with relation the gas cap and the water area. This is a blow-up of the area the reserve, representing that part which overlays the pool itself dicating the red line on the large map]. The hatched areas are the avy leases. The white areas are private lands. You will note that e majority of the Navy leased acreage is either over the gas cap or e water area. The Standard Oil Co. of California owns 77.7 percent the entire area; 3.5 percent, roughly, is owned in fee by the Tide ater Associated Oil Co.; 19.1775 percent is owned by the Navy, and is that 19.1775 percent that we are interested in.

Now, as to the Navy leases. The dotted red lines indicate the panded gas cap as it is today. The solid red lines indicate the gas p as it was at the time that the pool was discovered, in 1944. You ll notice we have two gas caps. This heavy green line indicates e extent of the water at the point when the field was discovered.
The dotted green lines indicate how the water has encroached into e field since the oil has been removed.

Now, you will see that the majority of the Navy leases are either the gas cap or on the water area, with the result that within the st year and a half our production—that is, the lessee's production on which our royalty is based—has gone from 16.9 percent down to 09 percent as of December last.

Mr. SHORT. Commodore, does any private oil company object to is proposed agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. I did not quite understand you, sir.

Mr. SHORT. I say, does any private oil company object to this roposed agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. No, sir. I have a telegram that I would ke to read into the record to answer that question.

Mr. BROOKS. What is this? Just a unitized drilling agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. No, sir; it is an agreement to repressure nd improve operating conditions.

Mr. BROOKS. And what are you going to increase the acreage by?

Commodore GREENMAN. There is no increase of acreage. The creage involved is just that acreage which overlays the productive rea of the pool.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROOKS. What is the unitized acreage going to be?

Commodore GREENMAN. The unitized acreage is 3,922.

Mr. BROOKS. But how much per well?

Commodore GREENMAN. Well, the purpose of the unitization, Mr. Brooks, is to operate the property as one unit. The number of wells that will be produced from unit will be based on that number which will most effectively produce the oil with the least loss of pressure. In other words——

Mr. BROOKS. It is not a drilling unitization agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BROOKS. But it is a production unitization agreement.

Commodore GREENMAN. Exactly. As a matter of fact, it is doubtful whether any more wells will ever be drilled into this pool.

Mr. BROOKS. And you figure by unitizing you will get a greater recovery to the United States.

Commodore GREENMAN. There is not any question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now read the telegram from one of the parties that agrees to it.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir. This telegram was addressed to me and it was just after I talked with you Mr. Chairman, about the hearing. There is reference in here about delay and the concern of the operators because production is dropping.

Reference to your wire about hearing on 27-B pool agreement. While you advise House Armed Services Committee will not reassemble until second week in March believe it desirable Navy impress necessity for early action when committee does reassemble because of the absolute necessity that gas injection commence in this pool as early as possible in order to assure greatest ultimate recovery.

I will explain that gas injection in a moment.

Injection equipment is available on the ground but construction cannot commence until agreement is finally approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the President. Further, some of proposed participants under agreement are becoming increasingly concerned over present production practices which do not give them their fair current share of pool production and the fact that artificial lifting equipment will have to be installed in the near future if pressure-control operations are not commenced.

Mr. BROOKS. You are going to recycle the gas?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir. It is a recycling to a certain extent, but it is actually building up pressures in the field.

Believe every possible effort should be made to have an agreement finally approved so it may become effective on the 1st of April.

Now in addition to that——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone who is not coming into this unit agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir, the North American Oil Co. which has a lease down here—right in here [indicating]. The other participants in the area are now negotiating with the North American Oil Co. to give them a greater percentage of that amount of oil that they think they are entitled to on that particular lease.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what effect would that have on the whole field, by this company refusing to come in under the unit agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. If this company refuses to come in it will mean that they will continue to overproduce from this edge of the field which will to a certain degree work against the repressuring program that is to be instituted as soon as this agreement becomes effective.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN. Now this unit——

Commodore GREENMAN. It is not a matter of their not coming in, Mr. Vinson, so much as it is a question of their being assured of their equity.

The CHAIRMAN. Of participation.

Commodore GREENMAN. Of participation; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Commodore GREENMAN. I talked with Mr. Bryant when I was in San Francisco about 3 weeks ago, and he indicated to me they felt they were approaching an agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, who is this unit agreement being entered into with? What companies?

Commodore GREENMAN. The Standard Oil Co. of California, which owns 77.7 percent——

The CHAIRMAN. Is a unit agreement satisfactory to them?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir. I have a letter signed by all the participants in which they all agree to sign. A copy of this letter was included in the brochure that you, Mr. Chairman, gave each member of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. All right. What other company?

Commodore GREENMAN. Tide Water Associated Oil Co., which owns about 7.9 percent in the field and of that 7.9 percent a little over 3 percent is fee and the rest of it is Navy lease.

The CHAIRMAN. They are satisfied?

Commodore GREENMAN. They are satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is next?

Commodore GREENMAN. The Honolulu Oil Corp. is next.

The CHAIRMAN. Which one?

Commodore GREENMAN. The Honolulu Oil Corp. is next.

Honolulu has 7.8 percent, represented in Navy leases. They have signified their willingness to come into this agreement. The Murvale Oil Co., which owns 2.96 percent, has also indicated a willingness to come into it. And Union Oil Co., that owns 1.7 percent as far as Navy leases are concerned, also has indicated a willingness.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have letters from all these companies agreeing to the unit contract?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the unit contract has been approved by the Judge Advocate General of the Navy Department?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Approved by the Attorney General?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Approved by the Department of the Interior?

Commodore GREENMAN. It was found in the best interests of the Government by the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. Now all that is necessary is for the Secretary of the Navy and the President to approve it.

Commodore GREENMAN. That is correct. But before we can go further this committee has to signify that we have complied with the law as far as consultation is concerned.

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Towe.

Digitized by Google

Mr. TOWE. Commodore, is this proposed agreement substantially the same as the one heretofore entered into covering joint operations?

Commodore GREENMAN. As far as the Navy is concerned, no. As far as the Interior Department is concerned, yes. It is quite similar to a unit agreement that they have entered into with the fee owners and lease owners in Coalinga Nose, which is about 50 miles north and west of the Elk Hills.

As a matter of fact, the Secretary of the Interior in his letter refers to this agreement, Coalings Nose Agreement, and states that our agreement is similar to that one.

The CHAIRMAN. The law does not require that the committee approve it.

Commodore GREENMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The law merely requires you to lay it before the committee and give the committee the information, which you are giving now.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And when that has been accomplished, then if the committee does not agree with you, of course, the committee can take other action.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I have had a memorandum drawn up:

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is to advise that consultation with the House Committee on Armed Services has been had by the Department of the Navy in respect to the proposed unit agreement for the 27-B Pool of the Buena Vista Hills oil and gas field, Naval Reserve No. 2, Kern County, Calif., as required by law.

And then it goes one sentence further:

And this committee interposes no objection to the consummation of the proposed agreement.

That is all we have to do.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Could I ask the commodore one question more?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to find out, is the California Company going to operate the unitized agreement?

Commodore GREENMAN. The Standard Oil Co. of California has been elected by the operators to operate this field; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to my sending the letter I have just read to Mr. Sullivan, the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. SHORT. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman.

Commodore, under existing arrangements, do you feel that the Government is not receiving its just proportionate share of oil?

Commodore GREENMAN. Very definitely, sir. Could I refer you to that mimeographed sheet that you have in front of you? Under item B, I have taken the production from the field for the month of December and have made a comparison with what the Navy's share would be if we were taking that same amount of oil under the unitized plan.

The total amount of production on a competitive basis—which is the basis we are operating on now—is 948,759 barrels a month. The Navy's lessees' share of that oil, by the actual oil produced from the field within that area that we propose to unitize, is 86,177 barrels, or 8 percent. The royalty oil on that lessees' share is 10,725 barrels, rth $27,310 for that month of December.

Now let us take the same amount of oil and assume the area is tized. Under the unitized plan, using the same amount of pro-tion, 948,759 barrels, the Navy's lessees would get 181,950 barrels, 19.17 percent.

Mr. SHORT. Under the proposed arrangement the Government's ount of oil will be materially increased.

Commodore GREENMAN. By 118 percent.

Mr. SHORT. Will the private companies be decreased?

Commodore GREENMAN. The private companies have agreed, sir, t in the interest——

Mr. SHORT. Will it be decreased? If the Government is increased, private companies will be decreased; will they not?

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Mr. SHORT. And the Government owns only 19 percent of the land his area—the pool.

Commodore GREENMAN. That is right. The private companies uld be decreased. But they make it up in the end. Mr. Short——

Mr. SHORT. You are making a pretty good trade. But you are not ng to gouge private owners and individuals are you?

Commodore GREENMAN. No sir; we are entitled Mr. Short to a alty on every drop of oil that is produced from that field.

Mr. SHORT. And you are not getting it now.

Commodore GREENMAN. Well, because of the fact that secondary overy which this really amounts to has not yet been instituted in field. But the lessees made a good deal with the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. RIVERS. If you do not agree they would not get anything.

Commodore GREENMAN. If we do not agree we will lose.

Mr. RIVERS. I see.

Commodore GREENMAN. We will lose. They will all lose but the vy will be the greatest loser.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other information the committee ires from the commodore in reference to this unit agreement?

What is the sense of the committee with reference to addressing this mmunication to the Secretary?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman I move that the chairman be authorized send the communication to the Secretary which has already been d.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection I am authorized to send the er which will be put in the record to the Secretary.

And at the same time commodore I want to put in the record rything relating to this transaction.

Commodore GREENMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Commodore.

FAREWELL CEREMONIES FOR SECRETARY OF DEFENSE JAMES FORRESTAL

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Tuesday, March 29, 1949.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Carl Vinson (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

Mr. Secretary Forrestal, this is not an ordinary committee meeting of the kind you have participated in so frequently in this room in the days that have gone by.

This is a special meeting. It is called for a specific purpose—to take official note of your retirement yesterday from your high office in the Government.

Mr. Secretary, you have a long and brilliant career. Much of it has been on the highest level of finance and industry. But it is in the service of your country, as a high official of our Government, that you have most singularly distinguished yourself among your fellow citizens.

I recall that on August 20, 1940, you assumed the office of the Under Secretary of the Navy. Much of the world was then at war. That was the time when the Nation as a whole—and the Congress and official Washington in particular—were beset on the one hand with the hope that this country could avoid war and, on the other hand, with the fear that we could not.

At that time, what did we have in the way of a Navy? When you became Under Secretary of the Navy, we had 1,058 vessels of all types, comprising 1,892,000 tons, of which 383 were combat vessels. We then had only 189,000 men in the entire Naval Establishment. This seemed a large force in those days.

It was then that your characteristic vision first became apparent. For in those troubled times, when the future was cloudy, you foresaw not only the scope but the very nature of the conflict in which we were to be so soon involved.

It was your foresight—and this is a matter of historical record—which resulted in the early plans for the procurement of large volumes of material and its construction into naval weapons.

It was your vision and the magnitude of the conflict just over the horizon that prompted the Navy to embark upon its huge construction program of 200 combatant ships at a cost of over $3,000,000,000.

This was a tremendous task then. And it was undertaken at a most difficult time. The results you achieved in the brief time remaining before hostilities bore fruit at a most critical time.

Then came Pearl Harbor. The blow, though serious, was not deadly due largely to your efforts of the preceding year. Due to your far-sighted preparations, the Navy Department had been brought to a state of readiness where it could replace in part and repair sufficiently most of the losses and damage.

It was 8 months to the day after Pearl Harbor that the Navy struck back to check our enemy in the Pacific at a critical point in his advance. At Guadalcanal Navy ships and aircraft and Marines engaged the enemy in a ferocious contest. I well recall the Imperial Japanese Command proclaimed this engagement to be crucial.

The progress made in the short period of 8 months from the disaster of Pearl Harbor to the grim struggle at Guadalcanal is a measure of the amazing achievements for which you are in large part responsible.

Two years later, on May 19, 1944, when we were saddened by Secretary Knox's untimely death, you became Secretary of the Navy.

The war was now reaching a climax. Two and one-half years of warfare had passed and the organized might of American industry had reached that astonishing and irresistible height which foretold victory.

In the short space of 4 years since you first took office in the Navy Department, the Navy had grown from 189,000 men to 3,600,000, from 383 combat vessels to 1,500 combat vessels, and from 1,058 vessels of all types, comprising 1,892,000 tons, to more than 40,000 vessels, aggregating more than 10,000,000 tons.

This was a phenomenal accomplishment—a tribute to American ingenuity, enterprise, and determination, and especially a tribute to your painstaking and far-sighted efforts as Under Secretary of the Navy.

So, as the new Secretary of the Navy, with the production problem already in hand, your concern was mainly one of governing, administering, and directing the full force of the flood of naval weapons and sailors to use them, which were pouring out in a steady stream against our enemy across two oceans and reaching out to many lands.

During this time the great sea battles of the Pacific were undertaken. The campaigns of the Carolinas and the Marianas and others were a prelude to the greatest sea battle in the history of the world. It was your privilege, Mr. Secretary, to be the head of the Navy Department at the time of the battle of Leyte Gulf where the opposing sea power was decisively defeated. You were fortunate, indeed, to see the culmination of your thought and efforts in the brilliant accomplishment of our fighting forces and the final surrender of our enemy on the deck of the battleship Missouri.

Yes; it was your responsibility and high historic privilege to guide the destiny of the largest Navy in all the history of man—probably the largest Navy ever again to be seen.

And it was likewise your responsibility to direct the expenditure of much of the $118,000,000,000 appropriated for the Navy since July 1940, and never—not once—in all these difficult years was there any criticism of the administration of these vast funds.

This is truly a great record of which you have every right to be proud, and for which the Nation may be everlastingly grateful.

Mr. Secretary, in the years I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs and, more recently, this committee, a number of great and distinguished Americans have held the office of the Secretary of the Navy. Let me name a few to recall to our minds the great character and ability this country must recruit from its citizens to fill the office of the head of one of our military departments.

Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina, a gentleman and patriot, forthright and vigorous, was the first I knew, and he left a large mark in the history of the Navy. Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts was another who brought great talent and high character to this office. And Claude Swanson, of Virginia, was a statesman and administrator of notable vigor and integrity.

Mr. Secretary, I deem it a privilege to say that you have every right to be numbered in the distinguished company of these great citizens, who have given so much of themselves to the country through their task of governing the Navy Department.

It is, in fact, a fair statement, Mr. Secretary, that you have assumed and performed with distinction duties far transcending in responsibility any heretofore undertaken by any previous Navy Secretary in the history of our great Nation.

That you filled the office in such critical and momentous days would be honor enough for any man.

That you filled the office with such outstanding success entitles you to distinction and recognition far beyond that attainable by more than few men in our history.

Certainly your attainments will have lasting influence on the Navy, on the National Military Establishment, on the Nation as a whole—influence working to the Nation's advantage far into the future.

With the end of the war, not only the Navy but the other services as well were confronted by other great problems.

The lessons of the war had to be applied quickly while they were still fresh in all minds.

Certainly the guiding principle of the war was that of teamwork.

So acutely had you become aware of this that it was due in large measure to your efforts that the Congress enacted the National Security Act of 1947.

Then, on September 17 of that year, you became this country's first Secretary of Defense.

The task you then undertook, and from which you have just departed, was that of welding our armed forces into an effective team.

Assuredly this has not been and is not today an easy task.

And as all of us know who have dealt with these matters, such a task cannot be accomplished overnight.

Your efforts as Secretary of Defense have been highly successful.

They have resulted in notable and meritorious progress—progress which others less gifted with administrative acumen, patience, and vision would have found wholly impossible.

In view of all of these significant events in which you have played so commanding a role, we want it long remembered and permanently recorded here that your outstanding talents and accomplishments on the highest levels of our Government have been appreciated and valued highly by this committee and the Congress.

Your wise counsel and devoted service have been a tower of strength in aiding the old Naval Affairs Committee and this committee in the discharge of its responsibilities.

Mr. Secretary, on behalf of the committee, I present you this token of our high esteem. Engraven upon it you will find our names in testimony of our regard. That regard is also indelibly inscribed in our hearts.

Digitized by Google

We will miss you, Mr. Secretary. [Applause.]

(Presentation made.)

Secretary FORRESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I am too much overcome by what I consider to be a very gracious and a very moving testimonial of your friendship and of those deeper feelings that come from the heart.

I should like to say for the record, however, without venturing to contradict the rhetoric of the chairman, that that tribute which he gave should properly be directed to himself and to the members of this committee because it was the unfailing zeal, the high intelligence, and the continuing zest for work which really built the American Navy and which under the chairmanship of Mr. Vinson will also build the defense forces under the unification which I know will be ably guided by Colonel Johnson, my successor.

I am much too moved to go into a longer appreciation for this most generous and exceptional act. I thank you deeply. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Short.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, Secretary Forrestal, and fellow Americans, often I have thought, "Now I know I was born to be an anticlimax." But as a member of the minority I wish to say on their behalf—and I am sure it is the sentiment of every member of this committee—that we wholeheartedly concur in the very fine, noble, and well-deserved comments of our distinguished and able chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, in regard to James Forrestal.

Loquacious as I might be at times, those who know me best I think will agree I am not prone to flattery or addicted to fulsomeness, but I can't refrain from saying on this occasion which is both pleasant and sad that in my own personal opinion James Forrestal is the perfect example of the highest type of public servant. After spending a year at Dartmouth and 3 years at Princeton, he learned a little about zinc and more about tobacco. He is one of those awful investment bankers. But when the First World War came on he quit his lucrative job and went into the service, I think, as a seaman second class. He came out a naval aviator. He served his country well in war as he has in peace. He came up the hard way, as a poor boy, to become president of Dillon, Read & Co. He was selected by the President of the United States in 1940 to come as his executive assistant to Washington.

Grand are the names of our military and naval and air officers who were at the guns. We should not forget the men back of the guns and back of the men behind the guns. I think through the terrible, trying years of the war much of the credit for our victory should go to the Under Secretaries, Bob Patterson, Jim Forrestal, and Jack McCloy. They did a marvelous job. They did it so well that two of them were made the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy following their illustrious predecessors.

Nobly and ably as they served their country during war, I want to say that following the war in this most difficult period of transition the first Secretary of National Defense will always be remembered for the outstanding job he did in a most difficult, complicated, and almost impossible position.

Digitized by Google

Jim Forrestal will forever be remembered by the members of this mmittee because of the admirable mixture of imperturbability and daring that is in him. Always cool, calm, courteous, courageous, d kind, he has won a permanent place in all of our hearts.

We regret to see you leave, sir; because we have seen you literally ar yourself away at this job, working from early in the morning til late at night. The public doesn't know the agony through which u have gone. With all of these contending forces and conflicting erests, in an atmosphere of disputatious contentiousness you have ored. And I think you have brought forth something more than nouse. I am sure that the success you have achieved has been due gely to the cooperation and the understanding of Secretary Royall, cretary Sullivan, and Secretary Symington.

We need a natural, healthy rivalry among our armed forces. It is a od thing. But we do want to forget the little, petty jealousies, kerings, and bitterness. We shall continue to strive for unity, peration and solidarity.

You are going to be succeeded by a great American, an illustrious ldier. I think I am not out of order, Mr. Chairman, when I say at Louis Johnson will have the same consideration and the same peration from this committee which Mr. Forrestal has had. Cerinly we have not always agreed with him. We have fought and ttled. But the members of this committee are a big family. I ppen to be No. 8 in a brood of 10 children at home. We used to ht and knock each other over and break the furniture up at home, t whenever some stranger or outsider jumped on one of us kids he d the whole damn family to whip. We are not always going to ree in the future, but I can promise you this: We have the welfare the Nation at heart and the security of this country uppermost in r minds and we want to do everything in our power to keep America rong and to contribute our share to the establishment of a just and sting peace.

As you leave us, Mr. Secretary, we want to wish you continued ccess, which we know your clean mind and clear mind, your stout d honest heart, and your ready and able hands will achieve. We pe most of all that you will get just a little well-earned and well-served rest. We wish you the best of health and God speed in all our undertakings. That comes from our hearts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Short.

Now, members of the committee, I have the honor to present to ou the new Secretary of National Defense, Mr. Johnson. [Applause.]

Secretary JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my friend Jim Forrestal, to the limit of my knowledge, I subscribe to everything that has been said about Jim Forrestal's record. f my own personal knowledge during these last 60 days—and, arenthetically, the only well-kept secret since it was known Jim as retiring is the fact that Jim and I have been working together; ven the Pentagon didn't find out about that until it was announced—luring that 60 days in which I came to value Jim Forrestal's friendhip, I came to value, too, a keen, incisive mind, one of the best nalytical minds I have ever come to know. I have come to treasure he love of America, with the friendship between us that has now leveloped, that prompted him to help me get started on this job. I know I can do a little better job from this 60 days of intensive effor on Jim Forrestal's part to indoctrinate me.

I am glad to come before this committee, Mr. Chairman, and bea testimony to my affection for Jim Forrestal, but more importantly to bear testimony to the debt of gratitude I owe for his patience wit me in this past 60 days. I haven't the gift of words of your brillian testimonial. It is one of the finest things I have ever heard. don't have round phrases like your colleague on your left used. don't come from a family of eight. There were only six of us. W had the same sort of experiences.

I want the privilege of coming before this committee when you don't send for me sometimes and with the doors shut just talk abou some of the problems that Jim leaves for me.

And lastly, I want to say that there are things that will happen in the Pentagon in the next 3 or 4 weeks, a month or two, and the headlines will probably say Louis Johnson did this or that. I want you t know—for instance, there are two announcements that we will mak at the press conference today on reorganizational matters and th headlines will say Louis Johnson did that—that those things are th results of studies that go back for months under the direction of Jim Forrestal and all that happened is they weren't quite ready to be an nounced before Jim came out over there and the credit is really Jim's

I want to say further, sir, my affection for him and my appreciation for the foundation he laid is so great that never knowingly will there be a word come out of the Pentagon against the great record of Jim Forrestal. [Applause.]

Secretary FORRESTAL. If I might, I cannot let this occasion pass without paying tribute to the men who are seated behind me: Secretary Royall of the Army, who has given the most devoted and loyal service; Secretary of the Navy Mr. Sullivan; and Secretary of the Air Force Mr. Symington, whose zeal and high devotion to his beliefs will be a lasting tribute to his record. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. May I assure the distinguished new Secretary of National Defense, Mr. Johnson, that I know I speak for all of the committee when I say that we will welcome at all times counsel and advice. And we will be calling on you and no doubt you will be calling on us, and we will try to work with one objective in view—the best interests of our great country.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, before you do, may I make the suggestion by direction of the committee that the remarks of yourself, as the chairman of this committee, and the remarks of Mr. Short, representing the minority, be inserted in the Record, in order that the entire Congress may know how we feel about Jim Forrestal.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask Mr. Brooks to do that.

Now, I want to ask the policy committee to meet with me at 2 o'clock. I have a matter that I think is necessary to bring up for consideration of the policy committee.

Mr. SHORT. I think we overlooked just one thing, Mr. Chairman. I am sure our professional staff, who worked so closely with you, Mr. Secretary, and with all the other Secretaries here, as well as our office force, will heartily agree with everything Mr. Vinson and myself have said.

Secretary FORRESTAL. To your staff, Mr. Short and Mr. Chairman, both the committee and the military services are very deeply indebted. They have made a very great contribution of intelligence and perception and work to the efforts of your committee and to the accomplishments of the military services.

Mr. SHORT. We think we have the best staff on the Hill.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that two of the Departments desire to present their seal to the committee.

Secretary FORRESTAL. This is the official seal, Mr. Chairman, of the National Military Establishment.

(Presents seal.)

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Mr. Secretary, we will place that on the wall of the committee room. We thank you very much for giving us the official seal of the National Military Establishment.

Secretary SYMINGTON. Mr. Chairman, it is my privilege to present this seal of the Department of the Air Force to you and the members of the committee, sir.

(Presents seal.)

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Secretary Symington. We appreciate it very much.

We already have here the seal of the Navy Department and I think the seal of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, members of the committee, we have a very distinguished member of the Hook Commission, Father Cavanaugh, and the bill on which he is going to address the committee has been referred to the subcommittee headed by Mr. Kilday. So I ask Mr. Kilday to take the chair and ask Father Cavanaugh to please come around.

Thank you, Mr. Secretary. Thank you, Mr. Secretary Johnson. We thank all you gentlemen.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, may I take up this list of acquisitions and disposals?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee agrees to what Mr. Sasscer has there in his hand.

TO PROMOTE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE AND TO CONTRIBUTE TO MORE EFFECTIVE AERONAUTICAL RESEARCH BY AUTHORIZING PROFESSIONAL PERSONNEL OF THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS TO ATTEND ACCREDITED GRADUATE SCHOOLS FOR RESEARCH AND STUDY (H. R. 3946). MR. VINSON

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS,
Washington 25, D. C., March 29, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker of the House of Representatives,
The Capitol, Washington 25, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics has experienced considerable difficulty in retaining capable research scientists because of their natural desire to increase their knowledge and ability while obtaining academic advanced degrees in their chosen fields. Some of the most promising young employees who have left the NACA to obtain such degrees have not returned upon completion of their studies because of more lucrative offers from other sources. As a consequence, the NACA's aeronautical research program has been handicapped.

It is believed that this situation can be improved and that the NACA can function more effectively if legislative authority is obtained to grant employees limited leaves of absence with pay for advance study in fields closely related to the NACA's research program.

There is submitted herewith a draft of bill which would permit the granting of such limited leaves of absence. This bill provides that the employee shall pay his own tuition and other academic expenses. The interest of the Government is protected by the provision requiring that the employee return to the NACA, or reimburse the Government for the leave granted.

As prescribed in the attached draft of bill, leaves of absence will be granted under this authority only in those cases where the special course of study to be undertaken by the employee would qualify him for more effective work with the NACA.

The NACA has been authorized by the Bureau of the Budget to submit this proposed legislation to the Congress. It is respectfully requested that it be introduced in the Eighty-first Congress.

Sincerely yours,

J. F. VICTORY, Executive Secretary.

TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF EXPERIMENTAL SUBMARINES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 4007). MR. BROOKS

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, March 31, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Navy recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To amend the act to authorize the construction of experimental submarines, and for other purposes, approved May 16, 1947."

This legislation has been approved for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the establishment has been placed in the Department of the Navy.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

Attachment.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, March 24, 1949.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a proposed draft of a bill to amend the act to authorize the construction of experimental submarines, and for other purposes, approved May 16, 1947.

The purpose of the bill is to remove the limit of $30,000,000 on the cost of the two experimental submarines authorized by the act of May 16, 1947 (61 Stat. 96). At the time this cost limit was established only the rudimentary characteristics of the submarines in question were available. Primarily due to increases in the cost of labor and material, present estimates, based on a more definite conception of the ultimate design of these vessels, exceed the above limit by approximately 50 percent. Without the removal of the limit, therefore, it will be impossible to complete the submarines with the required characteristics.

The estimated cost of this legislation is $10,500,000.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment and accordingly recommends its enactment.

This report has been coordinated within the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that the proposed bill is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

A BILL To amend the act to authorize the construction of experimental submarines, and for other purposes, approved May 16, 1947

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act of May 16, 1947 (61 Stat. 96), is hereby amended by deleting the following: ": Provided, That the cost of the vessels, the construction of which is authorized by this Act, shall not exceed $30,000,000." and substituting in lieu thereof a period.

TO AUTHORIZE ADVANCES IN PAY TO PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AIR FORCE, AND MARINE CORPS UPON PERMANENT CHANGE OF STATION, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 4050). MR. KILDAY

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, April 5, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Attached is a letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Navy recommending the enactment of a proposed draft of legislation, also attached, bearing the title "To authorize advances in pay to personnel of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps upon permanent change of station, and for other purposes."

This legislation has been approved for inclusion in the National Military Establishment legislative program for the Eighty-first Congress, first session, and responsibility for handling it on behalf of the establishment has been placed in the Department of the Navy.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

Enclosure.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, March 30, 1949.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is transmitted herewith a draft of a proposed bill to authorize advances in pay to personnel of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps upon permanent change of station, and for other purposes.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to authorize advances of not more than 3 months' pay to officers, and enlisted men of the first three pay grades, of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps upon change of station, and to authorize advances of pay and emoluments to such personnel when they are on duty at distant stations where their pay and emoluments cannot be disbursed regularly. The advances would be made under regulations prescribed by the head of the department concerned. The proposed bill would also protect disbursing officers who make advances in pay which result in the individual's account being overpaid at the time of discharge, death, or other separation from the service.

Under present law contained in the act of March 4, 1917 (39 Stat. 1181; 34 U. S. C. A. 875), advances of not more than 3 months' pay may be made to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps ordered to and from sea duty and to and from shore duty outside the continental limits of the United States under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. Subsection 1 (a) of the proposed legislation would change this provision of law so that advances of not more than 3 months' pay may be made to officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps upon change of station under such regulations as the head of the department concerned may prescribe.

Married service personnel ordinarily move their families with them from one permanent-duty station to another. In this connection, abnormal expenses are incurred, such as deposits on homes and utilities, packing and shipping costs, temporary storage of household effects, and transportation expenses. Although many of these expenses are reimbursable, payment is at a later date and available cash must be used to initiate and accomplish these items of personal business.

When the act of March 4, 1917, became law, officers of the Navy and Marine Corps were ordinarily assigned to sea duty following a tour of shore duty. That law amply provided for that particular situation, at that time, but is not now adequate since there are many persons in the service who need not perform sea duty and there are others who are assigned to duty which does not entitle them to sea and foreign-service pay but which does count as sea duty for rotational purposes. In addition, there are many instances where seagoing personnel are ordered from one shore billet to another during their stay ashore.

Enlisted personnel of the first three pay grades are included since they have the same responsibilities in these matters as officers.

Section 1563 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the President to direct such advances in pay and emoluments as he may deem necessary to persons in the naval service on distant stations where their pay and allowances cannot be disbursed regularly. Subsection 1 (b) of the proposed bill would change this provision of law so as to include personnel of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps, and so as to authorize the heads of the departments concerned to prescribe the regulations for the administration of the subsection.

The Navy Department, accordingly, recommends enactment of the proposed legislation.

Enactment of the proposed legislation would result in only such additional cost to the Government as might be incurred when a disbursing officer is unable to recover an advancement made in accordance with this legislation due to the death, discharge, or other separation of the overpaid individual from the service. Although this cost cannot be estimated, it is considered that it would be negligible in comparison to the benefits to be derived from such advancements.

The Navy Department has been designated by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to sponsor this proposal on behalf of the National Military Establishment and accordingly recommends its enactment.

This report has been coordinated among the departments and boards in the National Military Establishment in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

W. JOHN KENNEY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

TO AUTHORIZE THE APPOINTMENT OF COL. KENNETH D. NICHOLS, 017498, PROFESSOR OF THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY, IN THE PERMANENT GRADE OF COLONEL, REGULAR ARMY, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES (H. R. 4260). MR. VINSON

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
Washington, April 8, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to authorize the appointment of Col. Kenneth D. Nichols, 017498, professor of the United States Military Academy, in the permanent grade of colonel, Regular Army, and for other purposes, which the Department of the Army recommends be enacted into law.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to authorize the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, to place Major General (colonel, professor at the United States Military Academy) Nichols on the Army promotion list of the Regular Army in the same position he would have occupied had he remained on the Army promotion list and had been selected for promotion to the grade of colonel at the time his contemporaries were selected.

General Nichols served during the war in the grade of brigadier general as an assistant to Lt. Gen. Leslie R. Groves in connection with atomic-energy matters. Following the end of the war he was appointed a professor at the United States Military Academy. Upon the retirement of General Groves it was considered to be in the best interests of the Government to place General Nichols in charge of the Army's atomic-energy program. This proposed bill will authorize his return to the Army promotion list in his original place. There are no laws now in existence which would permit such a transfer.

This legislation does not involve the expenditure of additional public funds.

The Bureau of the Budget has been consulted and advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

KENNETH C. ROYALL,
Secretary of the Army.

UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Overton Brooks (chairman of Subcommittee No. 1) presiding.

Mr. BROOKS. The committee will please come to order.

We have the pleasure of having the distinguished chairman of the committee here—to the right of me—and in view of the fact that the chairman is here I would be very happy for him to take the chair.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, before we start the hearing on this bill, I want to suggest that on behalf of the committee Mr. Brooks of Louisiana and Mr. Short of Missouri prepare a suitable resolution expressing the deep sympathy on the passing of our former distinguished chairman, Mr. Andrews, and that they be sent to the members of his family.

I also suggest that the clerk on behalf of the committee secure a suitable floral offering and send that, and to advise the committee what he ascertains is going to be the program with reference to the funeral. I understood that probably there may be some exercise held here and if so, notify all the members so we can attend.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without objection the two gentlemen designated will prepare the resolution.

And before we take up this bill, today is consent calendar and we have three or four bills on the calendar, so we will have to recess at a quarter to 12.

And after we have the testimony of the distinguished Secretary of National Defense and Dr. Morgan—after they are finished—then I hope that the Subcommittee No. 1 will take this bill before its subcommittee and consider it section by section.

And tomorrow the Subcommittee No. 2 takes up the pay bill and will consider that bill.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Clerk, will you call the roll and see if we have a quorum?

Mr. VINSON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is not necessary to have a quorum to start the hearings.

Mr. BROOK. It is suggested that a roll call be dispensed with. Accordingly, we will proceed.

We are honored today in having the Secretary of National Defense with us, Mr. Forrestal.

Secretary Forrestal, we are very happy to have you, sir. And I think you have a prepared statement here. May I say, in starting, that this is an extremely important bill. There are very few bills that come closer to my own mind and my heart than does a uniform code for military justice, to cover the armed services.

(H. R. 2498 is as follows:)

[H. R. 2498, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles of the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a Uniform Code of Military Justice for the government of the armed forces of the United States, unifying, consolidating, revising, and codifying the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, is hereby enacted as follows, and the articles in this section may be cited as "Uniform Code of Military Justice, Article ".

partment shall substitute for the dismissal order by the President a form of discharge authorized for administrative issuance.

(b) If the President fails to convene a general court martial within six months from the presentation of an application for trial under this article, the Secretary of the Department shall substitute for the dismissal ordered by the President a form of discharge authorized for administrative issuance.

(c) Where a discharge is substituted for a dismissal under the authority of this article, the President alone may reappoint the officer to such commissioned rank and precedence as in the opinion of the President such former officer would have attained had he not been dismissed. The reappointment of such a former officer shall be without regard to position vacancy and shall affect the promotion status of other officers only insofar as the President may direct. All time between the dismissal and such reappointment shall be considered as actual service for all purposes, including the right to receive pay and allowances.

(d) When an officer is discharged from any armed force by administrative action or is dropped from the rolls by order of the President, there shall not be a right to trial under this article.

ART. 5. Territorial applicability of the code.

This code shall be applicable in all places.

ART. 6. Judge advocates and legal officers.

(a) The assignment for duty of all judge advocates of the Army and Air Force and law specialists of the Navy and Coast Guard shall be subject to the approval of The Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which they are members. The Judge Advocate General or senior members of his staff shall make frequent inspections in the field in supervision of the administration of military justice.

(b) Convening authorities shall at all times communicate directly with their staff judge advocates or legal officers in matters relating to the administration of military justice; and the staff judge advocate or legal officer of any command is authorized to communicate directly with the staff judge advocate or legal officer of a superior or subordinate command, or with The Judge Advocate General.

(c) No person who has acted as member, law officer, trial counsel, assistant trial counsel, defense counsel, assistant defense counsel, or investigating officer in any case shall subsequently act as a staff judge advocate or legal officer to any reviewing authority upon the same case.

PART II—APPREHENSION AND RESTRAINT

Article

7. Apprehension.
8. Apprehension of deserters.
9. Imposition of restraint.
10. Restraint of persons charged with offenses.
11. Reports and receiving of prisoners.
12. Confinement with enemy prisoners prohibited.
13. Punishment prohibited before trial.
14. Delivery of offenders to civil authorities.

ART. 7. Apprehension.

(a) Apprehension is the taking into custody of a person.

(b) Any person authorized under regulations governing the armed forces to apprehend persons subject to this code may do so upon reasonable belief that an offense has been committed and that the person apprehended committed it.

(c) All officers, warrant officers, petty officers, and noncommissioned officers shall have authority to quell all quarrels, frays, and disorders among persons subject to this code and to apprehend presons subject to this code who take part in the same.

ART. 8. Apprehension of deserters.

It shall be lawful for any civil officer having authority to apprehend offenders under the laws of the United States or of any State, District, Territory, or possession of the United States summarily to apprehend a deserter from the armed forces of the United States and deliver him into the custody of the armed forces of the United States.

ART. 9. Imposition of restraint.

(a) Arrest is the restraint of a person by an order directing him to remain within certain specified limits not imposed as a punishment for an offense. Confinement is the physical restraint of a person.

(b) An enlisted person may be ordered into arrest or confinement by any officer by an order delivered in person or through other persons subject to this code. A commanding officer may authorize warrant officers, petty officers, or noncommissioned officers to order enlisted persons of his command or subject to his authority into arrest or confinement.

(c) An officer, a warrant officer, or a civilian subject to this code may be ordered into arrest or confinement only by a commanding officer to whose authority he is subject, by an order delivered in person or by another officer. The authority to order such persons into arrest or confinement may not be delegated.

(d) No person shall be ordered into arrest or confinement except for probable cause.

(e) Nothing in this article shall be construed to limit the authority of persons authorized to apprehend offenders to secure the custody of an alleged offender until proper authority may be notified.

ART. 10. Restraint of persons charged with offenses.

Any person subject to this code charged with an offense under this code shall be ordered into arrest or confinement, as circumstances may require; but when charged only with an offense normally tried by a summary court-martial, such person shall not ordinarily be placed in confinement. When any person subject to this code is placed in arrest or confinement prior to trial, immediate steps shall be taken to inform him of the specific wrong of which he is accused and to try him or to dismiss the charges and release him.

ART. 11. Reports and receiving of prisoners.

(a) No provost marshal, commander of a guard, or master at arms shall refuse to receive or keep any prisoner committed to his charge by an officer of the armed forces, when the committing officer furnishes a statement, signed by him, of the offense charged against the prisoner.

(b) Every commander of a guard or master at arms to whose charge a prisoner is committed shall, within twenty-four hours after such commitment or as soon as he is relieved from guard, report to the commanding officer the name of such prisoner, the offense charged against him, and the name of the person who ordered or authorized the commitment.

ART. 12. Confinement with enemy prisoners prohibited.

No member of the armed forces of the United States shall be placed in confinement in immediate association with enemy prisoners or other foreign nationals not members of the armed forces of the United States.

ART. 13. Punishment prohibited before trial.

Subject to the provisions of article 57, no person, while being held for trial or the results of trial, shall be subjected to punishment or penalty other than arrest or confinement upon the charges pending against him, nor shall the arrest or confinement imposed upon him be any more rigorous than the circumstances require to insure his presence, but he may be subjected to punishment during such period for minor infractions of discipline.

ART. 14. Delivery of offenders to civil authorities.

(a) Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Department may prescribe, a member of the armed forces accused of an offense against civil authority may be delivered, upon request, to the civil authority for trial.

(b) When delivery under this article is made to any civil authority of a person undergoing sentence of a court-martial, such delivery, if followed by conviction in a civil tribunal, shall be held to interrupt the execution of the sentence of the court-martial, and the offender after having answered to the civil authorities for his offense shall, upon request, be returned to military custody for the completion of the said court-martial sentence.

PART III.—NON-JUDICIAL PUNISHMENT

Article
15. Commanding officer's non-judicial punishment.

ART. 15. Commanding officer's non-judicial punishment.

(a) Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, any commanding officer may, in addition to or in lieu of admonition or reprimand, impose one of the following disciplinary punishments for minor offenses without the intervention of a court-martial—

(1) upon officers and warrant officers of his command:

(A) Withholding of privileges for a period not to exceed two consecutive weeks; or

Digitized by Google

(B) restriction to certain specified limits, with or without suspension from duty, for a period not to exceed two consecutive weeks; or

(C) if imposed by an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction, forfeiture of one-half of his pay per month for a period not exceeding three months;

(2) upon other military personnel of his command:

(A) withholding of privileges for a period not to exceed two consecutive weeks; or

(B) restriction to certain specified limits, with or without suspension from duty, for a period not to exceed two consecutive weeks; or

(C) extra duties for a period not to exceed two consecutive weeks, and not to exceed two hours per day, holidays included; or

(D) reduction to next inferior grade if the grade from which demoted was established by the command or an equivalent or lower command; or

(E) confinement for a period not to exceed seven consecutive days; or

(F) confinement on bread and water or diminished rations for a period not to exceed five consecutive days; or

(G) if imposed by an officer exercising special court-martial jurisdiction, forfeiture of one-half of his pay for a period not exceeding one month.

(b) The Secretary of a Department may, by regulation, place limitations on the powers granted by this article with respect to the kind and amount of punishment authorized, the categories of commanding officers authorized to exercise such powers, and the applicability of this article to an accused who demands trial by court martial.

(c) An officer in charge may, for minor offenses, impose on enlisted persons assigned to the unit of which he is in charge, such of the punishments authorized to be imposed by commanding officers as the Secretary of the Department may by regulation specifically prescribe.

(d) A person punished under authority of this article who deems his punishment unjust or disproportionate to the offense may, through the proper channel, appeal to the next superior authority. The appeal shall be promptly forwarded and decided, but the person punished may in the meantime be required to undergo the punishment adjudged. The officer who imposes the punishment, his successor in command, and superior authority shall have power to suspend, set aside, or remit any part or amount of the punishment and to restore all rights, privileges, and property affected.

(e) The imposition and enforcement of disciplinary punishment under authority of this article for any act or omission shall not be a bar to trial by court-martial for a serious crime or offense growing out of the same act or omission, and not properly punishable under this article; but the fact that a disciplinary punishment has been enforced may be shown by the accused upon trial, and when so shown shall be considered in determining the measure of punishment to be adjudged in the event of a finding of guilty.

PART IV—COURTS-MARTIAL JURISDICTION

Article
16. Courts-martial classified.
17. Jurisdiction of courts-martial in general.
18. Jurisdiction of general courts-martial.
19. Jurisdiction of special courts-martial.
20. Jurisdiction of summary courts-martial.
21. Jurisdiction of courts-martial not exclusive.

ART. 16. Courts-martial classified.

There shall be three kinds of courts-martial in each of the armed forces, namely:

(1) General courts-martial, which shall consist of a law officer and any number of members not less than five;

(2) Special courts-martial, which shall consist of any number of members not less than three; and

(3) Summary courts-martial, which shall consist of one officer.

ART. 17. Jurisdiction of courts-martial in general.

(a) Each armed force shall have court-martial jurisdiction over all persons subject to this code. The exercise of jurisdiction by one armed force over personnel of another armed force shall be in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President.

(b) In all cases, departmental review subsequent to that by the officer with authority to convene a general court-martial for the command which held the trial, where such review is required under the provisions of this code, shall be carried out by the armed force of which the accused is a member.

ART. 18. Jurisdiction of general courts-martial.

Subject to article 17, general courts-martial shall have jurisdiction to try persons subject to this code for any offense made punishable by this code and may, under such limitations as the President may prescribe, adjudge any punishment not forbidden by this code. General courts-martial shall also have jurisdiction to try any person who by the law of war is subject to trial by a military tribunal and may adjudge any punishment permitted by the law of war.

ART. 19. Jurisdiction of special courts-martial.

Subject to article 17, special courts-martial shall have jurisdiction to try persons subject to this code for any noncapital offense made punishable by this code and, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, for capital offenses. Special courts-martial may, under such limitations as the President may prescribe, adjudge any punishment not forbidden by this code except death, dishonorable discharge, dismissal, confinement in excess of six months, hard labor without confinement in excess of three months, forfeiture of pay exceeding two-thirds pay per month, or forfeiture of pay for a period exceeding six months. A bad-conduct discharge shall not be adjudged unless a complete record of the proceedings and testimony before the court has been made.

ART. 20. Jurisdiction of summary courts-martial.

Subject to article 17, summary courts-martial shall have jurisdiction to try persons subject to this code except officers, warrant officers, cadets, aviation cadets, and midshipmen for any noncapital offense made punishable by this code, but no person who objects htereto shall be brought to trial before a summary court-martial unless he has been permitted to refuse punishment under article 15. Where such objection is made by the accused, trial shall be ordered by special or general court-martial, as may be appropriate. Summary courts-martial may, under such limitations as the President may prescribe, adjudge any punishment not forbidden by this code except death, dismissal, dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge, confinement in excess of one month, hard labor without confinement in excess of forty-five days, restriction to certain specified limits in excess of two months, or forfeiture of pay in excess of two-thirds of one month's pay.

ART. 21. Jurisdiction of courts-martial not exclusive.

The provisions of this code conferring jurisdiction upon courts-martial shall not be construed as depriving military commissions, provost courts, or other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction in respect of offenders or offenses that by statute or by the law of war may be tried by such military commissions, provost courts, or other military tribunals.

PART V—APPOINTMENT AND COMPOSITION OF COURTS-MARTIAL

(7) any other commanding officer in any of the armed forces when empowered by the President.

(b) When any such commanding officer is an accuser, the court shall be convened by superior competent authority, and may in any case be convened by such authority when deemed desirable by him.

ART. 23. Who may convene special courts-martial.

(a) Special courts-martial may be convened by—

(1) any person who may convene a general court-martial;

(2) the commanding officer of a district, garrison, fort, camp, station, Air Force base, auxiliary air field, or other place where members of the Army or Air Force are on duty;

(3) the commanding officer of a brigade, regiment, detached battalion, or corresponding unit of the Army;

(4) the commanding officer of a wing, group, or separate squadron of the Air Force;

(5) the commanding officer of any naval or Coast Guard vessel, shipyard, base, or station; or of any marine brigade, regiment or barracks;

(6) the commanding officer of any separate or detached command or group of detached units of any of the armed forces placed under a single commander for this purpose; or

(7) the commanding officer or officer in charge of any other command when empowered by the Secretary of a Department.

(b) When any such officer is an accuser, the court shall be convened by superior competent authority, and may in any case be convened, by such authority when deemed advisable by him.

ART. 24. Who may convene summary courts-martial.

(a) Summary courts-martial may be convened by—

(1) any person who may convene a genreal or special court-martial;

(2) the commanding officer of a detached company, or other detachment of the Army;

(3) the commanding officer of a detached squadron or other detachment of the Air Force; or

(4) the commanding officer or officer in charge of any other command when empowered by the Secretary of a Department.

(b) When but one officer is present with a command or detachment he shall be the summary court-martial of that command or detachment and shall hear and determine all summary court-martial cases brought before him. Summary courts-martial may, however, be convened in any case by superior competent authority when deemed desirable by him.

ART. 25. Who may serve on courts-martial.

(a) Any officer on active duty with the armed forces shall be competent to serve on all courts-martial for the trial of any person who may lawfully be brought before such courts for trial.

(b) Any warrant officer on active duty with the armed forces shall be competent to serve on general and special courts-martial for the trial of any person, other than an officer, who may lawfully be brought before such courts for trial.

(c) Any enlisted person on active duty with the armed forces who is not a member of the same unit as the accused shall be competent to serve on general and special courts-martial for the trial of any enlisted person who may lawfully be brought before such courts for trial, but he shall be appointed as a member of a court only if, prior to the convening of such court, the accused has requested in writing that enlisted persons serve on it. After such a request, no enlisted person shall be tried by a general or special court-martial the membership of which does not include enlisted persons in a number comprising at least one-third of the total membership of the court, unless competent enlisted persons cannot be obtained on account of physical conditions or military exigencies. Where such persons cannot be obtained, the court may be convened and the trial held without them, but the convening authority shall make a detailed written statement, to be appended to the record, stating why they could not be obtained.

For the purposes of this article, the word "unit" shall mean any regularly organized body as defined by the Secretary of the Department, but in no case shall it be a body larger than a company, a squadron, or a ship's crew, or than a body corresponding to one of them.

(d) (1) When it can be avoided, no person in the armed forces shall be tried by a court-martial any member of which is junior to him in rank or grade.

(2) When convening a court-martial, the convening authority shall appoint as members thereof such persons as, in his opinion, are best qualified for the duty by reason of age, education, training, experience, length of service, and judicial temperament. No person shall be eligible to sit as a member of a general or special court-martial when he is the accuser or a witness for the prosecution or has acted as investigating officer or as counsel in the same case.

ART. 26. Law officer of a general court-martial.

(a) The authority convening a general court-martial shall appoint as law officer thereof an officer who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States and who is certified to be qualified for such duty by The Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which he is a member. No person shall be eligible to act as law officer in a case when he is the accuser or a witness for the prosecution or has acted as investigating officer or as counsel in the same case.

(b) The law officer shall not consult with the members of the court, other than on the form of the findings as provided in article 39, except in the presence of the accused, trial counsel, and defense counsel, nor shall he vote with the members of the court.

ART. 27. Appointment of trial counsel and defense counsel.

(a) For each general and special court-martial the authority convening the court shall appoint a trial counsel and a defense counsel, together with such assistants as he deems necessary or appropriate. No person who has acted as investigating officer, law officer, or court member in any case shall act subsequently as trial counsel assistant trial counsel, or, unless expressly requested by the accused, as defense counsel or assistant defense counsel in the same case. No person who has acted for the prosecution shall act subsequently in the same case for the defense, nor shall any person who has acted for the defense act subsequently in the same case for the prosecution.

(b) Any person who is appointed as trial counsel or defense counsel in the case of a general court-martial—

(1) shall be a judge advocate of the Army or the Air Force, or a law specialist of the Navy or Coast Guard, or a person who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State; and

(2) shall be certified as competent to perform such duties by The Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which he is a member.

(c) In the case of a special court-martial—

(1) if the trial counsel is certified as competent to act as counsel before a general court-martial by The Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which he is a member, the defense counsel appointed by the convening authority shall be a person similarly certified; and

(2) if the trial counsel is a judge advocate, or a law specialist, or a member of the bar of a Federal court or the highest court of a State, the defense counsel appointed by the convening authority shall be one of the foregoing.

ART. 28. Appointment of reporters and interpreters.

Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Department may prescribe, the convening authority of a court-martial or military commission or a court of inquiry shall have power to appoint a reporter, who shall record the proceedings of and testimony taken before such court or commission. Under like regulations the convening authority of a court-martial, military commission, or court of inquiry may appoint an interpreter who shall interpret for the court or commission.

ART. 29. Absent and additional members.

(a) No member of a general or special court-martial shall be absent or excused after the accused has been arraigned except for physical disability or as a result of a challenge or by order of the convening authority for good cause.

(b) Whenever a general court martial is reduced below five members, the trial shall not proceed unless the convening authority appoints new members sufficient in number to provide not less than five members. When such new members have been sworn, the trial may proceed after the recorded testimony of each witness previously examined has been read to the court in the presence of the law officer, the accused, and counsel.

(c) Whenever a special court martial is reduced below three members, the trial shall not proceed unless the convening authority appoints new members sufficient in number to provide not less than three members. When such new members

31. Compulsory self-incrimination prohibited.
32. Investigation.
33. Forwarding of charges.
34. Advice of staff judge advocate and reference for trial.
35. Service of charges.

ART. 30. Charges and specifications.

(a) Charges and specifications shall be signed by a person subject to this code under oath before an officer of the armed forces authorized to administer oaths and shall state—

(1) that the signer has personal knowledge of, or has investigated, the matters set forth therein; and

(2) that the same are true in fact to the best of his knowledge and belief.

(b) Upon the preferring of charges, the proper authority shall take immediate steps to determine what disposition should be made thereof in the interest of justice and discipline, and the person accused shall be informed of the charges against him as soon as practicable.

ART. 31. Compulsory self-incrimination prohibited.

(a) No person subject to this code shall compel any person to incriminate himself or to answer any question the answer to which may tend to incriminate him.

(b) No person subject to this code shall interrogate, or request any statement from, an accused or a person suspected of an offense without first informing him of the nature of the accusation and advising him that he does not have to make any statement at all regarding the offense of which he is accused or suspected and that any statement made by him may be used as evidence against him in a trial by court-martial.

(c) No person subject to this code shall compel any person to make a statement or produce evidence before or for use before any military tribunal if the statement or evidence is not material to the issue and may tend to degrade him.

(d) No statement obtained from any person in violation of this article or by any unlawful inducement shall be received in evidence against him in a trial by court-martial.

ART. 32. Investigation.

(a) No charge or specification shall be referred to a general court-martial for trial until a thorough and impartial investigation of all the matters set forth therein has been made. This investigation shall include inquiries as to the truth of the matter set forth in the charges, form of charges, and the disposition which should be made of the case in the interest of justice and discipline.

(b) The accused shall be advised of the charges against him and shall be permitted, upon his own request, to be represented at such investigation by civilian counsel if provided by him, or military counsel of his own selection if such counsel be reasonably available, or by counsel appointed by the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction over the command. At such investigation full opportunity shall be given to the accused to cross-examine witnesses against him if they are available and to present anything he may desire in his own behalf, either in defense or mitigation, and the investigating officer shall examine available witnesses requested by the accused. If the charges are forwarded after such investigation, they shall be accompanied by a statement of the substance of the testimony taken on both sides and a copy thereof shall be given to the accused.

(c) If an investigation of the subject matter of an offense has been conducted prior to the time the accused is charged with the offense, and if the accused was present at such investigation and afforded the opportunities for representation, cross-examination, and presentation prescribed in subdivision (b) of this article, no further investigation of that charge is necessary under this article unless it is demanded by the accused after he is informed of the charge. A demand for further investigation entitles the accused to recall witnesses for further cross-examination and to offer any new evidence in his own behalf.

(d) The requirements of this article shall be binding on all persons administering this code, but failure to follow them in any case shall not constitute jurisdictional error.

ART. 33. Forwarding of charges.

When a person is held for trial by general court-martial, the commanding officer all, within eight days after the accused is ordered into arrest or confinement, if acticable, forward the charges, together with the investigation and allied papers, the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction. If the same is not acticable, he shall report to such officer the reasons for delay.

ART. 34. Advice of staff judge advocate and reference for trial.

(a) Before directing the trial of any charge by general court-martial, the conning authority shall refer it to his staff judge advocate or legal officer for considation and advice. The convening authority shall not refer a charge to a general urt-martial for trial unless it has been found that the charge alleges an offense der this code and is warranted by evidence indicated in the report of investition.

(b) If the charges or specifications are not formally correct or do not conform the substance of the evidence contained in the report of the investigating icer, formal corrections, and such changes in the charges and specifications as e needed to make them conform to the evidence may be made.

ART. 35. Service of charges.

The trial counsel to whom court-martial charges are referred for trial shall use to be served upon the accused a copy of the charges upon which trial is be had. In time of peace no person shall, against his objection, be brought to al before a general court-martial within a period of five days subsequent to the rvice of the charges upon him, or before a special court-martial within a period three days subsequent to the service of the charges upon him.

ART. 38. Duties of trial counsel and defense counsel.

(a) The trial counsel of a general or special court-martial shall prosecute in the name of the United States, and shall, under the direction of the court, prepare the record of the proceedings.

(b) The accused shall have the right to be represented in his defense before a general or special court-martial by civilian counsel if provided by him, or by military counsel of his own selection if reasonably available, or by the defense counsel duly appointed pursuant to article 27. Should the accused have counsel of his own selection, the duly appointed defense counsel, and assistant defense counsel, if any, shall, if the accused so desires, act as his associate counsel; otherwise they shall be excused by the president of the court.

(c) In every court-martial proceeding, the defense counsel may, in the event of conviction, forward for attachment to the record of proceedings a brief of such matters as he feels should be considered in behalf of the accused on review, including any objection to the contents of the record which he may deem appropriate.

(d) An assistant trial counsel of a general court-martial may, under the direction of the trial counsel or when he is qualified to be a trial counsel as required by article 27, perform any duty imposed by law, regulation, or the custom of the service upon the trial counsel of the court. An assistant trial counsel of a special court-martial may perform any duty of the trial counsel.

(e) An assistant defense counsel of a general or special court-martial may, under the direction of the defense counsel or when he is qualified to be the defense counsel as required by article 27, perform any duty imposed by law, regulation, or the custom of the service upon counsel for the accused.

ART. 39. Sessions.

Whenever a general or special court-martial is to deliberate or vote, only the members of the court shall be present. After a general court-martial has finally voted on the findings, the court may request the law officer and the reporter to appear before the court to put the findings in proper form, and such proceedings shall be on the record. All other proceedings, including any other consultation of the court with counsel or the law officer shall be made a part of the record and be in the presence of the accused, the defense counsel, the trial counsel, and in general court-martial cases, the law officer.

ART. 40. Continuances.

A court-martial may, for reasonable cause, grant a continuance to any party for such time and as often as may appear to be just.

ART. 41. Challenges.

(a) Members of a general or special court-martial and the law officer of a general court-martial may be challenged by the accused or the trial counsel for cause stated to the court. The court shall determine the relevancy and validity of challenges for cause, and shall not receive a challenge to more than one person at a time. Challenges by the trial counsel shall ordinarily be presented and decided before those by the accused are offered.

(b) The accused and trial counsel shall each be entitled to one peremptory challenge, but the law officer shall not be challenged except for cause.

ART. 42. Oaths.

(a) The law officer, all interpreters, and, in general and special courts-martial, the members, the trial counsel, assistant trial counsel, the defense counsel, assistant defense counsel, and the reporter shall take an oath or affirmation in the presence of the accused to perform their duties faithfully.

(b) All witnesses before courts-martial shall be examined on oath or affirmation.

ART. 43. Statute of limitations.

(a) A person charged with desertion or absence without leave in time of war, or with aiding the enemy, mutiny, or murder, may be tried and punished at any time without limitation.

(b) Except as otherwise provided in this article, a person charged with desertion in time of peace or any of the offenses punishable under articles 119 through 132 inclusive shall not be liable to be tried by court-martial if the offense was committed more than three years before the receipt of sworn charges and specifications by an officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command.

(c) Except as otherwise provided in this article, a person charged with any offense shall not be liable to be tried by court-martial or punished under article

15 if the offense was committed more than two years before the receipt of sworn charges and specifications by an officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command or before the imposition of punishment under article 15.

(d) Periods in which the accused was absent from territory in which the United States has the authority to apprehend him, or in the custody of civil authorities, or in the hands of the enemy, shall be excluded in computing the period of limitation prescribed in this article.

(e) In the case of any offense the trial of which in time of war is certified to the President by the Secretary of the Department to be detrimental to the prosecution of the war or inimical to the national security, the period of limitation prescribed in this article shall be extended to six months after the termination of hostilities as proclaimed by the President or by a joint resolution of Congress.

(f) When the United States is at war, the running of any statute of limitations applicable to any offense—

(1) involving fraud or attempted fraud against the United States or any agency thereof in any manner, whether by conspiracy or not; or

(2) committed in connection with the acquisition, care, handling, custody, control, or disposition of any real or personal property of the United States; or

(3) committed in connection with the negotiation, procurement, award, performance, payment for, interim financing, cancellation, or other termination or settlement, of any contract, subcontract, or purchase order which is connected with or related to the prosecution of the war, or with any disposition of termination inventory by any war contractor or Government agency; shall be suspended until three years after the termination of hostilities as proclaimed by the President or by a joint resolution of Congress.

ART. 44. Former jeopardy.

No person shall, without his consent, be tried a second time for the same offense; but no proceeding in which an accused has been found guilty by a court-martial upon any charge or specification shall be held to be a trial in the sense of this article until the finding of guilty has become final after review of the case has been fully completed.

ART. 45. Pleas of the accused.

(a) If an accused arraigned before a court-martial makes any irregular pleading, or after a plea of guilty sets up matter inconsistent with the plea, or if it appears that he has entered the plea of guilty improvidently or through lack of understanding of its meaning and effect, or if he fails or refuses to plead, a plea of not guilty shall be entered in the record, and the court shall proceed as though he had pleaded not guilty.

(b) A plea of guilty by the accused shall not be received in a capital case.

ART. 46. Opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence.

The trial counsel, defense counsel, and the court-martial shall have equal opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe. Process issued in court-martial cases to compel witnesses to appear and testify and to compel the production of other evidence shall be similar to that which courts of the United States having criminal jurisdiction may lawfully issue and shall run to any part of the United States, its Territories, and possessions.

ART. 47. Refusal to appear or testify.

(a) Every person not subject to this code who—

(1) has been duly subpenaed to appear as a witness before any court-martial, military commission, court of inquiry, or any other military court or board, or before any military or civil officer designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before such court, commission or board; and

(2) has been duly paid or tendered the fees and mileage of a witness at the rates allowed to witnesses attending the courts of the United States; and

(3) willfully neglects or refuses to appear, or refuses to qualify as a witness or to testify or to produce any evidence which such person may have been legally subpenaed to produce; shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States.

(b) Any person who commits an offense denounced by this article shall be tried on information in a United States district court or in a court of original criminal jurisdiction in any of the territorial possessions of the United States, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such courts for such purpose. Upon conviction, such persons shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, or both.

(c) It shall be the duty of the United States district attorney or the officer prosecuting for the Government in any such court of original criminal jurisdiction, upon the certification of the facts to him by the military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, to file an information against and prosecute any person violating this article.

(d) The fees and mileage of witnesses shall be advanced or paid out of the appropriations for the compensation of witnesses.

ART. 48. Contempts.

A court-martial, provost court, or military commission may punish for contempt any person who uses any menacing words, signs, or gestures in its presence, or who disturbs its proceedings by any riot or disorder. Such punishment shall not exceed confinement for thirty days or a fine of $100, or both.

ART. 49. Depositions.

(a) At any time after charges have been signed as provided in article 30, any party may take oral or written depositions unless an authority competent to convene a court-martial for the trial of such charges forbids it for good cause. If a deposition is to be taken before charges are referred for trial, such an authority may designate officers to represent the prosecution and the defense and may authorize such officers to take the deposition of any witness.

(b) The party at whose instance a deposition is to be taken shall give to every other party reasonable written notice of the time and place for taking the deposition.

(c) Depositions may be taken before and authenticated by any military or civil officer authorized by the laws of the United States or by the laws of the place where the deposition is taken to administer oaths.

(d) A duly authenticated deposition taken upon reasonable notice to the other party, so far as otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence, may be read in evidence before any military court or commission in any case not capital, or in any proceeding before a court of inquiry or military board, if it appears—

(1) that the witness resides or is beyond the State, Territory, or District in which the court, commission, or board is ordered to sit, or beyond the distance of one hundred miles from the place of trial or hearing; or

(2) that the witness by reason of death, age, sickness, bodily infirmity, imprisonment, military necessity, nonamenability to process, or other reasonable cause, is unable or refuses to appear and testify in person at the place of trial or hearing; or

(3) that the present whereabouts of the witness is unknown.

(e) Testimony by deposition may be adduced by the defense in capital cases.

(f) A deposition may be read in evidence in any case in which the death penalty is authorized by law but is not mandatory, whenever the convening authority shall have directed that the case be treated as not capital, and in such a case a sentence of death may not be adjudged by the court-martial.

ART. 50. Admissibility of records of courts of inquiry.

(a) In any case not capital and not extending to the dismissal of an officer, the sworn testimony, contained in the duly authenticated record of proceedings of a court of inquiry, of a person whose oral testimony cannot be obtained, may, if otherwise admissible, be read in evidence by any party before a court-martial or military commission if the accused was a party and was accorded the rights of an accused when before the court of inquiry or if the accused consents to the introduction of such evidence.

(b) Such testimony may be read in evidence only by the defense in capital cases or cases extending to the dismissal of an officer.

(c) Such testimony may also be read in evidence before a court of inquiry or a military board.

ART. 51. Voting and rulings.

(a) Voting by members of a general or special court martial upon questions of challenge, on the findings, and on the sentence shall be by secret written ballot. The junior member of the court shall in each case count the votes, which count shall be checked by the president, who shall forthwith announce the result of the ballot to the members of the court.

(b) The law officer of a general court martial and the president of a special court martial shall rule upon interlocutory questions, other than challenge, arising during the proceedings. Any such ruling made by the law officer of a general court martial upon any interlocutory question other than a motion for a finding of not guilty, or the question of accused's sanity, shall be final and shall constitute the ruling of the court; but the law officer may change any such ruling at any time during the trial. Unless such ruling be final, if any member objects thereto, the court shall be cleared and closed and the question decided by a vote as provided in article 52, viva voce, beginning with the junior in rank.

(c) Before a vote is taken on the findings, the law officer of a general court martial and the president of a special court martial shall, in the presence of the accused and counsel, instruct the court as to the elements of the offense and charge the court—

(1) that the accused must be presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established by legal and competent evidence beyond reasonable doubt;

(2) that in the case being considered, if there is a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, the doubt shall be resolved in favor of the accused and he shall be acquitted;

(3) that if there is a reasonable doubt as to the degree of guilt, the finding must be in a lower degree as to which there is no such doubt; and

(4) that the burden of proof to establish the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt is upon the Government.

ART. 52. Number of votes required.

(a) (1) No person shall be convicted of an offense for which the death penalty is made mandatory by law except by the concurrence of all the members of the court martial present at the time the vote is taken.

(2) No person shall be convicted of any other offense, except by the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present at the time the vote is taken.

(b) (1) No person shall be sentenced to suffer death, except by the concurrence of all the members of the court martial present at the time the vote is taken and for an offense in this code made expressly punishable by death.

(2) No person shall be sentenced to life imprisonment or to confinement in excess of ten years, except by the concurrence of three-fourths of the members present at the time the vote is taken.

(3) All other sentences shall be determined by the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present at the time the vote is taken.

(c) All other questions to be decided by the members of a general or special court-martial shall be determined by a majority vote. A tie vote on a challenge shall disqualify the member challenged. A tie vote on a motion for a finding of not guilty or on a question of the accused's sanity shall be a determination against the accused. A tie vote on any other question shall be a determination in favor of the accused.

ART. 53. Court to announce action.

Every court-martial shall announce its findings and sentence to the parties as soon as determined.

ART. 54. Record of trial.

(a) Each general court-martial shall keep a separate record of the proceedings of the trial of each case brought before it, and such record shall be authenticated by the signature of the president and the law officer. In case the record cannot be authenticated by either the president or the law officer, by reason of the death, disability, or absence of such officer, it shall be signed by a member in lieu of him. If both the president and the law officer are unavailable for such reasons, the record shall be authenticated by two members.

(b) Each special and summary court-martial shall keep a separate record of the proceedings in each case, which record shall contain such matter and be authenticated in such manner as may be required by regulations which the President may prescribe.

(c) A copy of the record of the proceedings of each general and special court-martial shall be given to the accused as soon as authenticated.

martial or inflicted upon any person subject to this code. The use of irons, single or double, except for the purpose of safe custody, is prohibited.

ART. 56. Maximum limits.

The punishment which a court-martial may direct for an offense shall not exceed such limits as the President may prescribe for that offense.

ART. 57. Effective date of sentences.

(a) Whenever a sentence of a court-martial as lawfully adjudged and approved includes a forfeiture of pay or allowances in addition to confinement not suspended, the forfeiture may apply to pay or allowances becoming due on or after the date such sentence is approved by the convening authority. No forfeiture shall extend to any pay or allowances accrued before such date.

(b) Any period of confinement not suspended included in a sentence of a court-martial shall begin to run from the date the sentence is adjudged by the court-martial.

(c) All other sentences of courts-martial shall become effective on the date ordered executed.

ART. 58. Execution of confinement.

(a) Under such instructions as the Department concerned may prescribe, any sentence of confinement adjudged by a court-martial or other military tribunal, whether or not such sentence includes discharge or dismissal, and whether or not such discharge or dismissal has been executed, may be carried into execution by confinement in any place of confinement under the control of any of the armed forces, or in any penal or correctional institution under the control of the United States, or which the United States may be allowed to use; and persons so confined in a penal or correctional institution not under the control of one of the armed forces shall be subject to the same discipline and treatment as persons confined or committed by the courts of the United States or of the State, Territory, District, or place in which the institution is situated.

(b) The omission of the words "hard labor" in any sentence of a court-martial adjudging confinement shall not be construed as depriving the authority executing such sentence of the power to require hard labor as a part of the punishment.

74. Remission and suspension.
75. Restoration.
76. Finality of court-martial judgments.

ART. 59. Error of law; lesser included offense.

(a) A finding or sentence of a court-martial shall not be held incorrect on the ground of an error of law unless the error materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused.

(b) Any reviewing authority with the power to approve or affirm a finding of guilty may approve or affirm, instead, so much of the finding as includes a lesser included offense.

ART. 60. Initial action on the record.

After every trial by court-martial the record shall be forwarded to the convening authority, and action thereon may be taken by the officer who convened the court, an officer commanding for the time being, a successor in command, or by any officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction.

ART. 61. Same—General court-martial records.

The convening authority shall refer the record of every general court-martial to his staff judge advocate or legal officer, who shall submit his written opinion reon to the convening authority. If the final action of the court has resulted an acquittal of all charges and specifications, the opinion shall be limited to stions of jurisdiction and shall be forwarded with the record to The Judge vocate General of the armed force of which the accused is a member.

T. 62. Reconsideration and revision.

a) If a case before a court-martial has been dismissed on motion and the ruling s not amount to a finding of not guilty, the convening authority may return record to the court for reconsideration of the ruling and any further appropriate ion.

b) Where there is an apparent error or omission in the record or where the ord shows improper action by a court-martial with respect to a finding or tence which can be rectified without material prejudice to the substantial hts of the accused, the convening authority may return the record to the court appropriate action. In no case, however, may the record be returned—

(1) for reconsideration of a finding of not guilty or a ruling which amounts to a finding of not guilty; or

(2) for increasing the severity of the sentence unless the sentence prescribed for the offense is mandatory.

T. 63. Rehearings.

(a) If the convening authority disapproves the findings and sentence of a urt-martial he may, except where there is lack of sufficient evidence in the record support the findings, order a rehearing, in which case he shall state the reasons for approval. If he does not order a rehearing, he shall dismiss the charges.

(b) Every rehearing shall take place before a court-martial composed of embers not members of the court-martial which first heard the case. Upon such hearing the accused shall not be tried for any offense of which he was found not uilty by the first court-martial, and no sentence in excess of or more severe than e original sentence shall be imposed unless the sentence is based upon a finding of uilty of an offense not considered upon the merits in the original proceedings or uless the sentence prescribed for the offense is mandatory.

RT. 64. Approval by the convening authority.

In acting on the findings and sentence of a court-martial, the convening authority ıall approve only such findings of guilty, and the sentence or such part or amount the sentence, as he finds correct in law and fact and determines should be pproved. Unless he indicates otherwise, approval of the sentence shall constitute pproval of the findings and sentence.

RT. 65. Disposition of records after review by the convening authority.

(a) When the convening authority has taken final action in a general court-ıartial case, he shall forward the entire record, including his action thereon and he opinion or opinions of the staff judge advocate or legal officer, to the appro-riate Judge Advocate General.

(b) Where the sentence of a special court-martial as approved by the convening uthority includes a bad-conduct discharge, whether or not suspended, the record hall be forwarded to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction ver the command to be reviewed in the same manner as a record of trial by general court-martial or directly to the appropriate Judge Advocate General to e reviewed by a board of review. If the sentence as approved by an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction includes a bad-conduct discharge, whether or not suspended, the record shall be forwarded to the appropriate Judge Advocate General to be reviewed by a board of review.

(c) All other special and summary court-martial records shall be reviewed by a judge advocate of the Army or Air Force, a law specialist of the Navy, or a law specialist or lawyer of the Coast Guard or Treasury Department and shall be transmitted and disposed of as the Secretary of the Department may prescribe by regulations.

ART. 66. Review by the board of review.

(a) The Judge Advocate General of each of the armed forces shall constitute in his office one or more boards of review, each composed of not less than three officers or civilians, each of whom shall be a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States.

(b) The Judge Advocate General shall refer to a board of review the record in every case of trial by court-martial in which the sentence, as approved, affects a general or flag officer or extends to death, dismissal of an officer, cadet, or mid-shipman, dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge, or confinement for more than one year.

(c) In a case referred to it, the board of review shall act only with respect to the findings and sentence as approved by the convening authority. It shall affirm only such findings of guilty, and the sentence or such part or amount of the sentence as it finds correct in law and fact and determines, on the basis of the entire record, should be approved. In considering the record, it shall have authority to weigh the evidence, judge the credibility of witnesses, and determine controverted questions of fact, recognizing that the trial court saw and heard the witnesses.

(d) If the board of review sets aside the findings and sentence, it may, except where the setting aside is based on lack of sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings, order a rehearing. . Otherwise it shall order that the charges be dismissed.

(e) Within ten days after any decision by a board of review, the Judge Advocate General may refer the case for reconsideration to the same or another board of review.

(f) Otherwise, the Judge Advocate General shall, unless there is to be further action by the President or the Secretary of the Department or the Judicial Council, instruct the convening authority to take action in accordance with the decision of the board of review. If the board of review has ordered a rehearing but the convening authority finds a rehearing impracticable, he may dismiss the charges.

(g) The Judge Advocates General of the armed forces shall prescribe uniform rules of procedure for proceedings in and before boards of review and shall meet periodically to formulate policies and procedure in regard to review of court-martial cases in the offices of the Judge Advocates General and by the boards of review.

ART. 67. Review by the Judicial Council.

(a) There is hereby established in the National Military Establishment a Judicial Council. The Judicial Council shall be composed of not less than three members. Each member of the Judicial Council shall be appointed by the President from civilian life and shall be a member of the bar admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States, and each member shall receive compensation and allowances equal to those paid to a judge of a United States Court of Appeals.

(b) Under rules of procedure which it shall prescribe, the Judicial Council shall review the record in the following cases:

(1) All cases in which the sentence, as affirmed by a board of review, affects a general or flag officer or extends to death;

(2) All cases reviewed by a board of review which The Judge Advocate General orders forwarded to the Judicial Council for review; and

(3) All cases reviewed by a board of review in which, upon petition of the accused and on good cause shown, the Judicial Council has granted a review.

(c) The accused shall have thirty days from the time he is notified of the decision of a board of review to petition the Judicial Council for a grant of review. The Judicial Council shall act upon such a petition within fifteen days of the receipt thereof.

(d) In any case reviewed by it, the Judicial Council shall act only with respect to the findings and sentence as approved by the convening authority and as affirmed or set aside as incorrect in law by the board of review. In a case which The Judge Advocate General orders forwarded to the Judicial Council, such action need be taken only with respect to the issues raised by him. In a case reviewed upon petition of the accused, such action need be taken only with respect to issues specified in the grant of review. The Judicial Council shall take action only with respect to matters of law.

(e) If the Judicial Council sets aside the findings and sentence, it may, except where the setting aside is based on lack of sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings, order a rehearing. Otherwise it shall order that the charges be dismissed.

(f) After it has acted on a case, the Judicial Council may direct The Judge Advocate General to return the record to the board of review for further review in accordance with the decision of the Judicial Council. Otherwise unless there is to be further action by the President, or the Secretary of the Department, The Judge Advocate General shall instruct the convening authority to take action in accordance with that decision. If the Judicial Council has ordered a rehearing, but the convening authority finds a rehearing impracticable, he may dismiss the charges.

(v) The provision of the Act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 874, 880, ch. 235), under the heading "Coast Guard", authorizing the trial of enlisted men in the Coast Guard by deck courts.

Mr. BROOKS. It has been suggested, and I think appropriately, that when Secretary Forrestal finishes his statement we not attempt to burden him with technical questions. If there are any questions of policy, I am sure he will be glad to answer them, but technical questions we ought to reserve for later.

Mr. Forrestal, you have your statement and the committee will be glad to hear it.

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF DEFENSE JAMES FORRESTAL

Secretary FORRESTAL. Mr. Chairman, if it is not inappropriate and if I may be permitted to digress for a moment from the substance of this statement, may I say that I would like to join this committee in their expression of profound regret at the death of your former chairman, who was a great patriot, an intelligent and well-informed legislator, a great friend of the armed services, and a very loyal and devoted friend to all of us. If that is not inappropriate, I would like to have your permission to have that inserted in the record.

Mr. BROOKS. It is certainly appropriate, Secretary Forrestal.

Secretary FORRESTAL. And my sympathy to his family, in respect of his memory.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that when the House meets this morning that as many of the Members who possibly can be on the floor to pay tribute to our former distinguished chairman.

Secretary FORRESTAL. Mr. Chairman, in various recent statements and in my report to the President and the Congress covering the first 15 months of the existence of the National Military Establishment, I have described the more important steps that have been undertaken and the accomplishments which have been achieved.

From the outset, the unification of the court-martial procedures of the Army, Navy, and Air Force has had a high priority in the National Military Establishment because it is a field in which unification is logical and particularly desirable.

We have discovered, in studying many of the fields in which the Military Establishment operates, that unification requires careful, painstaking study. Major problems of complexity cannot be solved and unification achieved at the stroke of a pen. Unifying the Army and Navy court-martial procedures was no exception. It required concentrated hard work and was a most difficult job.

As you know, the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy stem from laws adopted early in the history of this country. From the beginning, the articles were marked by basic differences and their growth over the years reflected the varying customs of the services.

As a result, the special committee which undertook to draft the Uniform Code of Military Justice early last summer found differences in nomenclature, organization, function and procedure between the Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy.

While I am far from being an expert in the field—having no legal background—I must admit that when the project started I was sure that the committee would find a considerable number of areas which were not susceptible to uniform treatment.

It is extremely gratifying that the committee reduced those areas to the vanishing point, and we now have submitted to you a proposed code which can be uniformly applicable to all the armed forces in time of peace and war.

Another problem faced by the committee was to devise a code which would insure the maximum amount of justice within the framework of a military organization. We are all aware of the number of criticisms which have been levelled against the court-martial system over the years.

I do not believe it is as bad as it has been painted, nor as good as some of its defenders claim. Many of the criticisms have seemed to me to be without foundation, but many of them have seemed to me to be justified.

The point of proper accommodation between the meting out of justice and the performance of military operations—which involved not only the fighting, but also the winning of wars—is one which no one has discovered.

I do not know of any expert on the subject—military or civilian—who can be said to have the perfect solution. Suffice it to say, we are striving for maximum military performance and maximum justice. I believe the proposed code is the nearest approach to those ideals.

Great credit is, therefore, due to the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force and the members of the committee who represented then Assistant Secretary Gordon Gray of the Army, Under Secretary John Kenney of the Navy, and Assistant Secretary Eugene Zuckert of the Air Force.

Prof. Edmund M. Morgan, of the Harvard University Law School, acted as chairman, and under his leadership a remarkable degree of unanimity was achieved within the committee. I say "remarkable" because, in view of the kind and number of problems before them, they are divided on only three issues. These issues were submitted to me and the proposed code incorporates my decisions on them. Two other provisions have been incorporated at the request of the Bureau of the Budget.

A project of this kind of necessity represents the combined views of a number of people, and each and every participant partially compromised his views on a number of points. Therefore, the proposed code is not the product of one person, nor would it have all its present provisions if written by one person or by one department.

The Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the Coast Guard, Professor Morgan and I each support the many individual provisions with varying shades of enthusiasm, but the committee agreed on all points, except to the extent I have mentioned.

For this reason, I think the proposed code should be analyzed as an integrated whole. On that basis, it is my opinion that the code as set forth in H. R. 2498 is well-designed to protect the rights of those subject to it and to afford more equal and uniform justice to the members of all the armed forces.

I believe it does not interfere with appropriate military functions. Since it has these characteristics, I strongly urge your favorable consideration.

As you know, I am not a lawyer and so will not attempt to explain to you the details of the proposed code. Professor Morgan has agreed to take up that burden on my behalf, and Mr. Felix Larkin of my staff can supply you with the technical information you may need.

If you desire testimony from the members of the committee, from the Judge Advocate General, or from anyone else in the National Military Establishment, they are available at your call.

Without taking more of your time, I would like to conclude my remarks and introduce Professor Morgan who, as I have said, was the extremely able chairman of the committee which drafted the proposed code.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Secretary Forrestal. We appreciate your very fine statement.

Now, if there are no questions on matters of broad comprehensive policy of the Secretary, the committee will call Dr. Edmund M. Morgan, Jr., of the Harvard Law School and also chairman of the committee which framed this proposed legislation.

Dr. Morgan, the committee is very happy to have you appear here.

And, Mr. Secretary, we appreciate your coming down here and thank you most kindly.

Dr. MORGAN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that Mr. Secretary Forrestal may have pressing business and that he be excused, unless he desires to stay.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Secretary, you may remain if you care to, but if you have pressing business, it will be all right for you to leave.

Secretary FORRESTAL. I will appreciate the courtesy of the committee if they will excuse me.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

Dr. Morgan?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Doctor, before you begin your statement, could I ask you about how long you have been working on this measure?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, sir. The working group began some time in June and I began some time in August. We have just completed it—just a couple of weeks ago. We had very numerous meetings of the committee from August on, and the work group under Mr. Larkin met a great number of times while the committee was not in session.

The sessions of the committee would last from a day to 2 days.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, before he begins, I beg to be excused because I have to appear before a subcommittee of appropriations in about 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. All right.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, before we start——

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Vinson.

Mr. VINSON. While our colleague from Ohio, Mr. Elston, who is a very able lawyer, is not a member of the subcommittee, I do hope that Mr. Elston will try to sit in on all the meetings of the subcommittee when this bill is being presented. I would appreciate it as a personal favor if you will give the committee the benefit of your profound legal knowledge and sit in with the committee.

Mr. ELSTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. VINSON. And during the last Congress you were chairman of the legal subcommittee. And I hope you will be able to attend each one of these meetings and contribute to the country your valuable assistance with reference to the preparation of a measure of this character.

Mr. ELSTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will be glad to do it whenever I possibly can.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, we did an able job, too, on that bill.

Doctor, will you proceed.

STATEMENT OF PROF. EDMUND M. MORGAN, JR., HARVARD UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL

Dr. MORGAN. First I better thank you for the degree which you just conferred upon me.

For this opportunity to appear before you in support of H. R. 2498, I thank you personally and in behalf of the committee which drafted it at the request of Secretary Forrestal. In the hope of putting before you in the shortest time the essential features of the code, I have prepared a statement, which I regret to say is rather long, but which I find impossible to shorten since the bill covers the entire field of military justice. With your permission I shall read it.

H. R. 2498 is the result of an intensive study of the present systems and practices of the several departments or branches of the military forces, of the complaints that have been made against both the structure and operation of the existing military tribunals, of the explanations and answers of the services to those complaints, of the various suggestions that have been made for modification or reform and of the arguments of representatives of the services as to the practicability of each proposal.

In some instances we found helpful, information concerning the practices of foreign military establishments. Copies of data compiled by the staff of the committee under the direction of Mr. Larkin, assistant general counsel, Secretary of Defense, have been supplied for your use.

You will see them here. Here is a copy of it. So you can see there was really a lot of work done, even though you may conclude that it did not do very much good to some of our intellects. But certainly all the data here were compiled here and summarized, you see.

Our directive, which we endeavored to obey, was to create a code that would be applicable to all the armed forces—Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard; a code that would operate uniformly for the unified Military Establishment.

We have also tried to phrase the code in modern legislative language and to arrange its provisions in orderly sequence, so that it would be understandable to laymen and to civilian lawyers as well as to men learned in military law.

The code is designed to supersede (a) the Articles of War including the amendments contained in the Selective Service Act of 1948, (b) the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and (c) the Disciplinary Laws of the Coast Guard. As you know, there are at present no separate articles governing the Air Force or the Marine Corps.

If passed, the code will be the sole statutory authority embodying both the substantive and the procedural law governing military justice and its administration. There will be the same law and the same procedure governing all personnel in the armed services.

That this should be so is the settled conviction of most people and I believe no argument is necessary to demonstrate its validity.

In the same way that all persons in this country are subject to the same Federal laws and triable by the same procedure in all Federal courts, so it will be in the armed forces.

The original trial of an accused will be in a court of his own service, except in certain circumstances where he is a member of a force acting jointly with another. The departmental review will follow a similar course.

But the procedure before trial, at the trial, and on review will be the same as if the case had occurred in either of the other armed forces. The final review on the law will be made by the same tribunal for all the Departments of the Military Establishment.

The objective is to make certain not only that justice can be done to the accused but that there be no disparities between the services. A civilian lawyer will have no difficulty in conducting any case at any stage of the proceeding.

You will doubtless consider each of the 140 articles contained in the code and compare it, by cross-reference, with the corresponding provision in the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy which it supplants.

Inasmuch as a large portion of the code has its foundation in those two statutes, in many instances there is very little that is new in the uniform code except the language. There are a number of provisions, however, which were not heretofore contained in either the Articles of War or the Articles for the Government of the Navy and to which you will probably wish to give special consideration.

By a brief summary of the contents of each part of the uniform code, starting at the beginning, I can indicate to you I think those articles which are incorporations of present provisions and practices, those which are incorporations of the amendment of last year to the Articles of War, and those articles which are new.

Part I of the code concerns itself with general provisions which are usually found in modern penal laws. This part contains, in addition to definitions, the general jurisdictional provisions of military law. There is little in this part which is entirely new.

Article 4, however, is a noteworthy change for the Army and Air Force in that it provides that, in cases where an officer is dismissed by the President without trial and in the event he is later exonerated, he may be restored to active duty.

Article 6 extends to the Navy the provisions passed by the Congress at the last session requiring assignments for duty of judge advocates and legal officers to be subject to the approval of the appropriate Judge Advocate General and requiring consultation by convening authorities with staff judge advocates or legal officers in matters relating to the administration of military justice.

Part II, which consists of articles 7 through 14, covers the general subject of apprehension and restraint. It is new only to the extent that the conflicting definitions of the terms used and the different processes have been simplified and made more orderly.

Attention is drawn, specifically, to article 12, which continues the provision enacted by the Eightieth Congress in connection with confinement of members of the armed forces with enemy prisoners and enemy nationals.

Part III consists of one article only—article 15—which deals with nonjudicial punishment imposable by commanding officers. This is commonly called company punishment in the Army, and punishment at mast in the Navy.

As you will notice, the article lists all the punishments now so imposable by both the Army and the Navy. The present practice of the Army differs from that of the Navy. The permitted punishments are different.

The Army practice has been to impose less severe punishment and to give the accused an option to demand trial by court martial. The Navy has imposed somewhat more severe penalties and has given the accused no option.

This diversity in practice is due to two factors: (1) men on shipboard are necessarily in a different situation with reference to freedom of motion and availability of replacement than men in camp; (2) the punishment is imposed at mast by the captain, and a summary court consists of an inferior officer, while in the Army such an incongruity in rank between a commanding officer and a summary court would be virtually unknown.

The committee concluded that these factors justified a difference in treatment. Consequently article 15, first, subjects the imposition of these nonjudicial penalties to complete regulation by the President, and, second, gives the Secretary of each Department discretionary power to put additional limitations upon them and to provide for an option to the accused to demand a court martial.

One further provision of interest in this article is subdivision (d) which strengthens the present system of appeals from nonjudicial punishment and permits reviewing authorities not only to remit the unexecuted portion of punishment, but to restore rights adversely affected.

Part IV in its article 16 creates three classes of courts martial—general, special, and summary. These correspond to the present courts in the Army. The special court martial under present Navy practice is called a summary court, and the summary court is called a deck court.

The chief difference from the present Army provision is the requirement that a general court shall consist of at least five members and a law officer.

Most of the articles consist of a rewording and revision of provisions found at present in both the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy. Article 17, however, is new in that it provides reciprocal jurisdiction of courts martial.

By its terms, each armed force shall have court-martial jurisdiction over all persons subject to the Uniform Code. There is thus provided authority for an Army court martial to try either its own personnel or the personnel of the Navy, the Air Force, or the Coast Guard.

It is felt that this provision is necessary in the light of unification and by virtue of the tendency to have military operations undertaken by joint forces. Inasmuch as it is not possible at this time to forecast the different forms of joint operation which will take place in the future, the exercise of the reciprocal jurisdiction of one armed force over the personnel of other services has been left to the regulations of the President.

In this way a desirable flexibility is attained which will enable the President to prescribe the types of operations in which reciprocal jurisdiction will be exercised.

You gentlemen are probably aware that at the present time the Military Air Transport Service is already practically a permanent joint operation, with an Air general in charge and an admiral next in command, so that there is already one joint operation.

Part V, which has to do with the appointment and composition of courts martial, includes articles 22 through 29. These fix the qualifications of the persons who may convene general, special, and summary courts and the persons who may serve on courts martial.

Article 25 provides for the service of enlisted men on courts which try enlisted men and follows the provision of Public Law 759 of the Eightieth Congress. Articles 26 and 27 deserve special mention. The former, which provides for a law officer on general courts martial, changes the practice of the Navy which has heretofore had no judge on its courts.

It also changes the practice of the Army, which has had a law member, in that this official will now act solely as a judge and not as a member of the court, which becomes much like a civilian jury. The law officer will not retire with the court.

Article 27, which provides for the appointment of trial counsel and defense counsel, changes present Army and Navy law in that it makes it mandatory for each counsel before a general court martial to be either a judge advocate or a law specialist, or a person admitted to practice in the Federal or the highest court of a State, and to be certified by the Judge Advocate General as competent.

Digitized by Google

Heretofore, lawyers acted as counsel only if they were found available by the convening authority.

And as you probably know, gentlemen, the decision of the commanding general as to whether they were available was held to be final.

The committee believes that the provisions of these two articles will tend to make the general court martial a more independent tribunal staffed by competent and efficient lawyers.

Part VI covers the provisions governing pretrial procedure and, in the main, the articles in this part follow present Army practice as prescribed in the amendment of 1948. The Navy practice of pretrial investigation is less formal than that of the Army. By the new provisions, both of them will be the same.

Part VII, articles 36–54, covers trial procedure and follows closely the present Army and Navy practices. A good many of the provisions, however, now make uniform a number of minor differences which have heretofore existed.

Article 37 continues the provision passed by the Congress last year prohibiting unlawful influence on the actions of courts martial. The committee believed it most desirable to continue this salutary prohibition, which will do much to eliminate so-called command control.

Article 41, which provides one preemptory challenge of members of general and special courts, follows present Army practice, but changes Navy practice, which heretofore had no provision for preemptory challenges.

Another example of uniformity is found in article 51, which covers the question of voting and rulings. As set out by the provisions of the article, the law officer now becomes more nearly an impartial judge in the manner of civilian courts.

In addition to ruling on interlocutory questions of law during the course of the trial, the law officer is now required to instruct the court, on the record, before it retires as to the elements of the offense and to charge the court on presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt and burden of proof.

In article 52, you will notice that the number of votes required for both conviction and sentence have been made uniform for all the services.

Part VIII, articles 55–58, deals with sentences and has nothing new in it except an authorization to the respective Secretaries to make regulations for carrying into execution any sentence of confinement in any correctional or penal institution under the control of the United States.

This was drafted after consultation with the correctional branches of the services and its purpose is to make available more adequate facilities for rehabilitation of offenders.

Part IX, articles 59–76, provides for the appellate review of court-martial cases. It makes a number of innovations in which I am sure you will be interested. When the committee considered the whole subject of appellate review, it found that the present procedures of the Army and Navy differed widely.

The Army system is exceedingly complex. To the review by the convening authority and the board of review, further review was added last year by Congress by a Judicial Council composed of three general officers.

The course of review for several types of case is painstakingly spelled out in the Articles of War by reference to and in conjunction with the respective functions of approving and confirming authorities, and is difficult for the uninitiated to diagram or understand.

In studying this system, the Navy felt that it was wholly impracticable for its operations. The Navy system of review, on the other hand, is far more informal and, in the main, rests ultimately with the Secretary of the Navy.

It provides a review by the convening authority, a review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, and an additional review on sentence by the Bureau of Presonnel and by a sentence review board. The action of all these agencies, however, is advisory only.

The Army thought this system unsuited to its needs. The committee felt obliged to devise a system that would be useful and practical for all services, and would be consonant with the plan of unification.

In essence, the appellate review proposed in the Uniform Code is as follows: There is an initial review by the convening authority covering law, facts, credibility of witnesses and a review of the sentence.

In this respect, it is in all essentials the same as the first review provided at the present time by both the Army and the Navy. Insofar as the convening authority has affirmed a finding or sentence against the accused, a review is provided by a board of review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General of the Department of which accused is a member.

This board of review is a counterpart of the present board of review of the Army. As the amendment of 1948 provides, it reviews the records of the trial for law, facts, and sentence. To this extent, the Navy system is changed.

Following this review, there is a review for errors of law by a single Judicial Council, composed of three civilians. It is apparent that such a tribunal is necessary to insure uniformity of interpretation and administration throughout the armed services.

Moreover, it is consistent with the principle of civilian control of the armed forces that a court of final appeal on the law should be composed of civilians. With your permission I will now stop to to spell out further the many details of this system.

I should prefer to postpone further explanation of it until you take it up formally and in detail. At this time, we can show you some charts of this system and its comparison to the present Army and Navy systems. They will, I think, help you to visualize the whole problem.

Personally, I think I can explain it better without a chart than I can with a chart. I suppose that is because I am no statistician, because whenever you try to plot a curve or make a chart I begin to get confused.

I think I can explain it in language that at any rate a lawyer will understand.

Part IX also provides in article 70 for appellate counsel to assure that the parties will be adequately represented before the boards of review and the Judicial Council. They shall be appointed by the Judge Advocates General with provision for the accused to have his own counsel.

Digitized by Google

Article 72 provides for hearing before the suspension of a serious sentence can be vacated. Both of these articles are new.

Part X covers punitive articles. In the main, the present punitive articles of the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy are retained. There are, however, several interesting features of the present punitive articles.

In the first place, we have set forth some general provisions normally found in modern penal laws and not heretofore contained in the Articles of War or the Articles for the Government of the Navy.

These cover the definitions of a "principal," "an accessory after the fact," "attempts to commit crimes," "conspiracies," and "solicitations."

You will notice as you study the punitive articles that we have consolidated a number of them in the same fashion as we have consolidated a number of other provisions throughout the rest of the code.

An example of this is the crime of desertion, which is now contained in article 85. The same material was heretofore found in Articles of War 28 and 58 and in Articles for the Government of the Navy 10, 4 (par. 6), and 8 (par. 21).

In addition, we have made specific several offenses which were previously punishable under the general article. One of them we designate as "missing movement," which is contained in article 87.

This is an aggravated type of absence without leave and is designed to meet conditions encountered in World War II. The experience of World War II indicates that a large number of military personnel who were legitimately on leave or who left without permission returned after their unit or ship had moved or sailed.

This misconduct caused so much trouble that it was felt necessary to make it a subject of a specific article. Article 105, entitled "Misconduct as Prisoner," is also new and provides for punishment of anyone subject to the code, who while in the hands of the enemy in time of war, either for the purpose of securing favorable treatment for himself or while in a position of authority, mistreats others who are confined with him.

You will recall that a number of instances of this type came to light after the war. They justify the enactment of this specific offense.

The last part, namely part XI, contains a number of miscellaneous articles such as those regulating the procedures before courts of inquiry, those providing for authority to administer oaths, and for complaints against superiors, and for redress for damage done to private property by members of the armed forces.

One important concern of the committee throughout its deliberations was the position of military command in the court-martial system. Secretary Forrestal, in his precept to the committee, instructed us to draft a uniform code, to be uniform in substance and uniform in interpretation and construction, which would protect the rights of persons subject to the code without undue interference with appropriate military functions.

It was recognized from the beginning by the committee that a system of military justice which was only an instrumentality of the commander was as abhorrent as a system administered entirely by a civilian criminal court was impractical.

We had before us, as I have told you, studies made by various committees in the past and also the testimony presented to this committee in the last Congress. We were aware of the criticisms which had been made against the court-martial system and the defenses that have been put forward in its behalf.

We were convinced that a Code of Military Justice cannot ignore the military circumstances under which it must operate but we were equally determined that it must be designated to administer justice.

We, therefore, aimed at providing functions for command and appropriate procedures for the administration of justice. We have done our best to strike a fair balance, and believe that we have given appropriate recognition of each factor.

Because of the military nature of courts martial, we have left the convening of the courts, the reference of the charges, and the appointment of members to the commander. For the same reason, we have preserved the initial review of the findings and the sentence by the commander.

Having done this, we examined ways and means of restricting the commander to his legitimate functions. We have tried to prevent courts martial from being an instrumentality and agency to express the will of the commander.

To make the action of courts martial and the procedure for review free from his influence we have set up an impartial judge for the court martial, made it mandatory that lawyers represent the parties in the general court-martial cases, required the commander to consult before and after trial with his staff judge advocate or law specialist, and prohibited him from either censuring or reprimnading the court.

We have set up a system which resembles the independent civilian court, but we have placed it within the framework of military operations. At the trial and in the review of facts the men who function as counsel, trial judge, and intermediate appellate judges will be skilled in law and in military matters. They will be independent of command and subject to a supreme civilian tribunal on questions of law.

I am aware that there are many schools of thought on military justice, ranging all the way from those who sponsor complete military control, to those who support a complete absence of military participation. I do not believe either of these extremes represents the proper solution.

In closing my formal remarks, I would like to state again—for what it is worth—that I strongly support the uniform code and urge its approval by the Congress. As Secretary Forrestal told you, there was a remarkable unanimity among the members of the committee.

The code as submitted is not exactly what any one of us would have drawn had he been alone and starting without precedent. Many of the provisions on which there was unanimity were compromises. I support all these unanimous decisions, and I also support the decisions made by Secretary Forrestal.

I should be glad to try to answer any questions.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Professor Morgan.

Now I would like to call on the Chairman of our full committee to present the questions he has.

Mr. VINSON. I suggest that we go around the room and let the other members finish first.

Of course, I want to take this opportunity of expressing my gratification at the work that the committee has done to bring about a uniform code of procedure and practice in the armed services. I think it is a step that should have been taken years and years ago.

And your committee is to be commended for the outstanding service that you have rendered in enabling us to have a basis to enact the law. I want to thank you very much, Dr. Morgan, for the valuable services you have rendered and the aid you have given to the committee.

Dr. MORGAN. I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Mr. Vinson.

I would like to ask you if I may put three questions, and then I would like to turn the questioning entirely over to the committee.

The first one is the reason for the new procedure governing the law member. You touched upon that, but you did not give the behind-the-curtain reasons why the change was made.

Dr. MORGAN. Well, the fundamental notion was that the law officer ought to be as near like a civilian judge as it was possible under the circumstances.

I may say to you that the report of the English committee—which I have discovered since we drew this code—makes exactly the same kind of provision: Heretofore the English had the same—and I suppose they do still, until this recommendation is followed—system that the Army has had with the law member, having the law member rule on interlocutory questions and then charge the court and go out with it and act practically as a member.

They have now recommended—this committee which made a very careful study of the English system—that the law member now act in the same way as the civilian judge and that he do nothing without them.

Their notion was that after he has once done what a civilian judge would do he ought not to then go back and try to influence them on the facts. And we felt the same way. We felt that whatever influence that judge exercised should be on the record.

The charge which he gives them will be on the record—everything that he gives in open court will be on the record. When they go back to deliberate they are like a jury and there is no particular record with reference to that.

The law member, when he retires with the court, may make any kind of statement to them. And it has been stated—I would not say on how good authority—that frequently when he went back there why he said, "Of course the law is this way but you fellows don't have to follow it."

A judge, as you know, in the civilian court, except in a very few States, tells the jury that they have to follow the law as laid down and particularly the law which is in favor of the accused.

Your question was directed, I take it, Mr. Chairman, to the reason why we departed from the Army system.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes. My question was framed for the purpose of opening up that avenue of thought.

Dr. MORGAN. I see.

The Navy has no law officer. And of course the Army law officer now has to be a lawyer. Previously, that is previous to Congressman

Digitized by Google

Elston's bill, there was no requirement that the law officer should be law-trained.

And I think the 1948 amendment required that he should be law-trained. But he still could go back with the court.

Now the law officer may become sort of a professional juryman, if they kept reappointing the same person, and as you probably know the professional jurymen are the convicting jurymen usually.

If you kept getting the same jurymen all the time the number of convictions is very, very much greater than if you get a new jury.

Mr. BROOKS. Professor, the second question that I wanted to suggest to you is the reasoning behind the changes in reference to command influence. You covered that in the last part of your statement, but you did not give us the reasons why that was necessary—to make the changes.

Dr. MORGAN. In the first place, until the Elston bill that was passed last year, there was no statutory provision preventing command influence. As you probably remember, during the First World War the commanding officer could send the case back for reconsideration of an acquital.

And you probably remember also that when he cut down the sentence or when he ordered the whole thing set aside he reprimanded the court. Also during and after World War II there were a great many complaints.

For instance, Governor Gibson, of Vermont, was very wroth at the treatment that he had received as a member of a court martial, being called in by the commanding officer and reprimanded. And when Mr. Gibson told him that he was a lawyer and that they could not tell him how to decide cases, that the choice was to get him off the court or let him use his conscience on the case, they got him off the court.

So we were sure that you had to have some control over the command. And Mr. Elston's provision specifically forebade any of these so-called skin letters or any censure, of the court for any of its actions. And we continued that.

It has been suggested that that is not sufficient, that that does not of itself prevent it. So we have also made the exercise of improper influence an offense.

We think also that we have lessened the command influence by making for all the services the provision which was in the 1948 bill as to the extent of review by the Judge Advocate General's Office; namely, that they can review for law, fact, and sentence, so that they need approve only so much of it as they think entirely justified.

Now the board of review in the Judge Advocate General's Office will be far away from the scene of the commanding officer who convened the court. Before that 1948 act the Judge Advocate General's Office could act only on questions of law and not on questions of fact.

Now they can act on the facts. We think that a means of lessening command influence. And when it is a question of law, the case then—in the severe cases—will go to the Judicial Council, which will be a civilian court and, of course, entirely outside the influence of any officer.

Is that what you had in mind?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes; that is exactly what I had in mind.

The last question I wanted to present to you is the Judicial Council. Would you mind elaborating on that some?

Digitized by Google

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. Would you mind telling us the section of the bill that covers it?

Mr. SMART. Sixty-seven.

Dr. MORGAN. Well, we provide for a review by this civilian authority.

First, of course, we have the Judicial Council set up in the Military Establishment. The members of the council must be civilians and they are appointed by the President. Their qualifications are set out there.

They have to be admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States. They are really a military court of last resort.

Mr. RIVERS. These are the three civilians you are talking about?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes; that is right. We have called it a Judicial Council, using the language of the Elston bill. It is really a supreme judicial military court and it is composed entirely of civilians.

It must have at least three members. It may be that the number would have to be greater if the work proved to be too heavy for three members.

They review questions of law only. In the cases of death, where there is a death sentence, or where the sentence affects a general officer, an automatic review is provided. In cases where the penalty is as much as a year's imprisonment, then you have the equivalent of certiorari, in the civilian courts.

Before this Judicial Council and before the board of review, there is provision for appellate counsel to be appointed by the Judge Advocate General. They will represent the Government and the defendant.

They are to be trained lawyers, of course. So the accused will be represented on appeal.

We limit the civilian court to the review of questions of law. And I may say here, again, that the recommendation of the English committee—and we had no copy of their report until recently—is to the same effect.

Of course, the English committee had recommended no intermediate review at all, that is no automatic review of any courts-martial proceeding, but has recommended an appeal to a judicial body and that judicial body is composed of the person who used to be practically the Judge Advocate General and his assistants.

That judicial body consists entirely of civilians. The accused may appeal to that body on questions of law. So that committee has reached almost the same kind of conclusion that we have reached. That was composed of three civilians and two military personnel.

Mr. DURHAM. Who passes on the question of law?

Dr. MORGAN. Why the judicial council would. That is, the court of last resort would determine whether it was a question of law or a question of fact. And as you probably know, Congressman, it is a question of law whether there was any evidence upon which the tryer of fact could reasonably find a defendant, as in the civilian court.

Under our system, they would not pass on the weight of the evidence in the sense that they could set aside a finding because they thought it was against the weight of the evidence. They could set aside a finding of guilty only in case there was no evidence——

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. Then they would pass on the question of law after the appeal was brought up to them, is that right?

Dr. MORGAN. That is right. They would pass on questions of law just the way the civilian court does.

Mr. DURHAM. And every individual would have the right to appeal to this judicial body, is that right, on every conviction if you wanted to carry it that far?

Dr. MORGAN. Not everybody. First, if the sentence is greater than a year's imprisonment and if the board of review affirms that, then the accused may petition to have it reviewed.

Aud if the petition is like a certiorari petition, he has to show that there are reasonable grounds for belief that there has been an error of law committed which would be likely to prejudice him.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Kilday.

Mr. KILDAY. Professor, I was on the Elston subcommittee but I am not on this one, so I want to ask you some questions.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. On this provision.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. I notice that you provide for the establishment of a Judicial Council to consist of not less than three.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. Civilians.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. What would your recommendation be on it?

Dr. MORGAN. Well, I will have to tell you that this is one of the provisions that Secretary Forrestal changed at the request of the Bureau of the Budget. You see he said that in his statement.

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

Dr. MORGAN. It was left doubtful with us. We provided for the appointment of civilians. And we felt that Congress would have to determine the term: Whether or not they should go out with the administration, and so forth.

Mr. KILDAY. I think as good legislative practice we would more clearly have to define this office.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

I think the opinion of the committee would have been, because we canvassed this—and certainly it is my opinion—that these men should be appointed in exactly the same way that the circuit court of appeals judges are appointed.

Mr. KILDAY. During good behavior?

Dr. MORGAN. During good behavior, by the President, with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, I notice that you continue the existing system with reference to the review of any case involving dismissal or dishonorable discharge.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. They must automatically go to the board of review?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. But that is not true of the Judicial Council?

Dr. MORGAN. No, no, except the petition.

Mr. KILDAY. The committee specifically considered whether it should be automatically sent to the board of review?

Digitized by Google

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, we did.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, we had a great deal of trouble with this sort of thing in the last war, you know, under, I think it is article of war 50½, where any judgment of dismissal from the service or dishonorable discharge automatically went to the board of review.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. But if the commanding officer suspended that portion of the sentence as to dismissal or dishonorable discharge until he had completed his sentence, it did not go to the board of review.

Dr. MORGAN. Right.

Mr. KILDAY. So we found in many instances the discharge was suspended and became final without review and then the suspension was lifted and it was carried out. By this device the review was voided.

Dr. MORGAN. We plugged that hole. Whether the sentence of dismissal or discharge is suspended or not, the case has to go to the board of review.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, we had done that as to the Army in our bill last year.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. And you continue that as to all of the services here?

Dr. MORGAN. That is for all the services now, yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, another thing we had in mind there is when you are trying an enlisted man who is probably pretty well broken in spirit and without much advice, and so on, he is likely to waive those rights. That is the reason we wanted it to be automatic. You do not think that that is true when you get as high as the Judicial Council?

Dr. MORGAN. We provide that the counsel for the defense may send a brief to the board of review if he thinks it appropriate. We did not make it mandatory for fear the board of review would be influenced by the fact that he had not seen particular errors and thought they were not inportant in case defense counsel did not write a brief.

So if counsel for the defense thinks there are errors that the board of review ought specifically to handle he can send a brief up on it, you see. And then before the board of review the soldier can demand that appellate defense counsel be there, in the Judge Advocate General's Office, and appear for him.

And I suppose it would be on the advice of the defense counsel whether he would want to appeal to the Judicial Council, because they would cover only questions of law.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, you all agree that it should be only questions of law?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, because we thought it would hardly do to have the Judicial Council do more than a court of criminal appeals ordinarily does.

Mr. KILDAY. Well, in my State they review the facts, too.

Dr. MORGAN. They do in England, but they do not in most States, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. That would limit it, then, to a finding that there was no evidence, practically, is that right?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. That would be a question of law, that there is no evidence to support the judgment.

Digitized by Google

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. And that is as far as it can go.

Dr. MORGAN. If there ought to have been a directed verdict of acquittal, then the Judicial Council would have to bust the case.

Mr. KILDAY. So no matter how weak the evidence, or improbable or impossible, still they could not touch it?

Dr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. Kilday, there you get to the question of scintilla evidence: Unless you come from Alabama, that means no evidence. Alabama still has the scintilla rule, but practically every State in the Union has abandoned it. So you have to have more than a scintilla.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Vinson.

Mr. VINSON. Professor, I note with respect to article 17, the reciprocal jurisdiction of courts martial, that you leave that to regulation by the President.

Now, the thought is running through my mind, Why should it not follow the commanding officer? When you have a joint operation and the three services are serving together, the President could prescribe who would have authority to conduct the courts martial; that is, the Army, Navy, or Air Force.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right. You mean who shall be appointed?

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Now, why should it not say that whenever there is a joint operation that the responsibility should go to the commanding officer? You see, you are writing a code here, that is a code of procedure for uniform justice, but it is going to be dependent in this instance to regulations of the President.

Why should it not be positive, to say that there should be reciprocal authority, but it follows the commanding officer from whatever service he is in. For instance, if an Army officer is in command of a joint operation of the three services, then the Army has a right to conduct the courts martial.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. VINSON. But that is entirely left to the discretion of the President.

Now what harm would there be to say that the reciprocal jurisdiction is tied in with the commanding officer of the branch of service from which he comes?

Dr. MORGAN. That is, you say that the commanding officer should determine——

Mr. VINSON. Well, it is whatever service he comes from. That automatically would cover it.

Dr. MORGAN. Of course, we contemplated that the President would so provide where it was impractical to have the courts martial composed of the men of the service to which the accused belongs.

It would be under those circumstances that he would provide that the court martial might be composed of men of the other services.

For instance, suppose that you had an admiral in the Pacific in the Military Air Transport Service. He is in command. He would have to appoint the court martial, would he not, of this mixed outfit?

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Digitized by Google

Dr. MORGAN. Now, is it your idea that it ought not to be by general regulation but that you should allow the commanding officer to determine that?

Mr. VINSON. The commanding officer, of which branch of the service he belongs to. Then the jurisdiction for the courts fall under that branch of the service. For instance, if you have a joint operation of the Army, Navy, and Air Force in the Mediterranean and if it so happens that a naval officer is in command, then the courts martial of the three services fall under the Navy. If you have down in Panama a joint operation of the three services and an Army officer is in command, then the court martial falls under the jurisdiction of the Army.

Dr. MORGAN. I see.

Mr. VINSON. It is based upon the command of the joint operation and not upon the regulations of the President. Because, you see, you are running into this, if there is not some kind of restriction somewhere: You might have it noised around that this Navy boy is going to be court-martialed by the Army or the Army boy is going to be court-martialed by the Navy.

And you will begin to find out rather early that there will be a good deal of criticisms, with the boys saying: "You better not get before the Army, the Army is going to be rough," or "You better not get before the Navy, the Navy is going to be rough."

Dr. MORGAN. Well, if the Navy lad was tried by the Army court-martial the board of review would be the Navy JAG.

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Dr. MORGAN. So you have that—have we not?

Mr. RIVERS. Of course, you have the same rules of procedure.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. RIVERS. And the same training for the boys.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. VINSON. You have the same rules of procedure, and everything. It is completely uniform. But it should be positive as to when the reciprocal responsibility is imposed, and it should not be discretionary.

Mr. KILDAY. Do you not have this practical situation: The convening authority has to be the authority who is there and who is in command.

Mr. VINSON. That is right, the commanding officer.

Mr. KILDAY. He is the only person who can convene the court and prefer the charges.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. So in the nature of things it is going to depend on who happens to be the over-all commander at the time.

Mr. VINSON. But——

Dr. MORGAN. Suppose you do not have enough officers of a particular branch to compose the court?

Mr. KILDAY. You have no one else there that exercises the functions of command for this purpose.

Dr. MORGAN. Mr. Larkin has conferred with the Navy and Army representatives on this particular provision and I think I will ask him whether he can clarify that a little more——

Mr. RIVERS. You do not provide for change of venue, do you?

Digitized by Google

Dr. MORGAN. No, we do not have any change of venue. And we do not have any affidavit of prejudice which is provided in the civilian courts to challenge a particular judge.

Mr. RIVERS. I can conceive that maybe a Navy man would not want to be tried by the Air Force or vice versa.

Mr. LARKIN. It is our notion, Mr. Chairman, that the services would continue to try their own people to the maximum extent.

In observing the tendency of military operations over the last few years and those that we can probably expect in the future, we believe that the tendency is more to joint types of operation.

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Mr. LARKIN. And on that basis we felt, even though we expect that each service would normally try its own personnel, that there be provisions so that each service could try the personnel of other services who happen to be serving in isolated areas with them, so that there would be an economy in the use of courts and there would be more expeditious trials.

We could not forecast, however, all the different types of possible joint operations in the future. We felt, therefore, it would be more flexible to leave it to the regulations of the President so that when we came upon circumstances in which it was clearly practical to have the top commander, whether of Army, Navy, or Air Force, have jurisdiction over all of the personnel of the other services serving under him then the exercise of that jurisdiction by the Army, if you will, over Navy and Air Force in that circumstance would be conferred.

But we did not feel it practical to provide automatically in advance the jurisdiction to the top commander because we just cannot forecast the composition of the joint forces or joint operations which may take place.

I think this example might help. Take the invasion of Europe, in which General Eisenhower was the top commander. If we provide that the service of the commander of the joint operation have courts-martial jurisdiction and may not try any Air Force or Navy men in that whole operation, why it would have been a provision that was unnecessary because there were plenty of Navy personnel there, that is there were plenty of appropriate naval officers who could convene courts within that whole big operation. There is no reason why they should not, following the idea that each service will normally try its own personnel.

Now, there may be other types of joint operations which we just cannot foresee at this minute in which it will be entirely appropriate for one service to exercise its jurisdiction over the other services and there will be others in which it is not necessary.

We felt, when they come up and when we can appraise them, at that time we can give the right to exercise this jurisdiction over the other services to the major service or the top commander present.

But to give it on a blanket basis when in some instances it is not necessary may create interservice problems there that we just could not foresee.

Now as Professor Morgan stated, more permanent operations by one service are coming into being which are partially staffed by the personnel of several services: MATS, for instance. And I quite agree that we ought in the near future spell out just what reciprocal jurisdiction should be provided for them.

Digitized by Google

But it is pretty much a case-by-case basis, I think, with the idea that we ought to have each service try its own people in the main, and we just left it in this form.

Mr. VINSON. What you have said, Mr. Larkin, would almost persuade me that you do not need the reciprocal provision, if you are going to have each service trying its men. I would visualize it from a unification standpoint, with one commanding officer being responsible for the whole operation, that he should have the right of courts martial on all services.

If you are not going to carry it out, what is the use of putting it in here, then? If you are going to continue to have each service court martial its own men, then you do not need anything with respect to courts martial reciprocal jurisdiction.

Mr. LARKIN. I think it is desirable, Mr. Chairman, that each service try its own men. I think that will take place in most cases because they usually are serving with a sufficient number of their own services and it is entirely feasible that they do so.

Mr. VINSON. If that is true, what is the use of putting it in this article 17, which is a new article? The theory of it was to have a unification. Yet you nullify it in the next breath.

Mr. LARKIN. Well, the idea was to make sure that we do have this statutory jurisdiction service-wide, but I do not think we are quite in a position at this minute to say that in each and every instance in every place this reciprocal jurisdiction should be and can be exercised by the top commander. I do not think it is quite necessary.

The tendency—and I am no military expert—I think is for more and more joint operations and I dare say by the time we have—if we ever do—complete joint operations or where every operation is a joint one, then we have the authority for one court, say an Army court, to try the personnel of the other services.

And the right to exercise that authority at that time will be conferred by the President. We wanted to make sure that we got the statutory authority in the first place. And we are not just sure of the extent of the exercise of it at this moment.

We feel the exercise of reciprocal jurisdiction is an evolutionary matter.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Kilday wanted to ask a question.

Mr. KILDAY. Under existing Articles of War, as to persons serving with troops in the field, even civilians are subject to court martial?

Mr. LARKIN. That is right.

Mr. KILDAY. Now, have the existing Articles of War spelled out ithat if a Navy man happened to be in an Army theater he was not subject to court martial by that service, even though a civilian would have been? Would he have to be turned over to the Navy?

Mr. LARKIN. That is correct, Mr. Kilday. There is one provision—n the Articles of War there is a provision that when marines are detached and serving with the Army they then are subject to the Articles of War.

It is more or less of a permanent detachment. But that is the only provision in the present statutes of any reciprocity at all. The Army cannot try a Navy man or an Air Force man now, and vice versa.

Mr. KILDAY. I have never had the question come up, but knowing so many civilians who served with the troops in the field that were convicted by court martial in the last war I was just wondering whether there was a prohibition there.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. I can see a good many reasons why it might be advisable to handle this by regulations rather than write it specifically in the law. If you had, for example, a naval commander in charge of an area it might be that a part of his command would consist entirely of Army men.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. That part of his command may be far removed from his headquarters.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. If the Navy had to try the Army men, by Army personnel because he was in over-all command, it might require the moving around of a great many Army personnel to serve on the court.

Mr. LARKIN. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. So I can see where it might be advisable for the President by regulations to handle the matter.

Dr. MORGAN. I think that was the view of the services when it was discussed with the representatives of the services, that the only practical way to do it was this way. I acquiesced because I know nothing about the operations, you see.

During World War I, I was safely ensconced in a chair.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, Professor Morgan, I think that you and your committee have done an excellent job. I have not had a chance to read the bill carefully, but I know that you devoted a great deal of time and attention to it and I think you were reaching out and trying to get all the information that would be helpful.

And I think it is particularly commendable that you used one of the members of our staff in your hearings. Mr. Smart, as I understand it, sat with you as an observer of this committee on many occasions.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. And I am quite certain he was helpful to you.

I think you have approached this subject in the right manner.

Now, as I understand it, a man tried in the service today is really given more of an opportunity for the review of his case than a civilian who is tried in the civilian courts?

Dr. MORGAN. Very much more.

Mr. ELSTON. And you have not completely divorced command influence because the commanding officer still has the opportunity to review a case?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, sir. You see, the commanding officer can do anything in favor of the accused. He cannot do anything against the accused.

Mr. ELSTON. That is right. He could not, for example, increase the penalty.

Dr. MORGAN. No, he cannot.

Mr. ELSTON. But he could decrease it.

Dr. MORGAN. He can decrease it, yes.

Mr. ELSTON. He could set aside entirely.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes. And he could set aside a part of the finding. Or he can bust it for any reason. If he thinks the court martial is spoiling a good soldier, for example, and he wants him back, he can bust it—to use the Regular Army term.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ELSTON. He can send it back for a new trial, can he not?

Dr. MORGAN. He can send it back for a new trial, except where there is not sufficient evidence in the record to sustain a conviction.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, if the accused is not satisfied with the commanding officer's final decision, as I understand it, he can appeal as a matter of right to the board of review?

Dr. MORGAN. Well, it goes up to the board of review for any affirmation, anything that is affirmed against the accused goes to the board of review in a general courts martial.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, the board of review can set aside cases because it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence?

Dr. MORGAN. Oh, yes. They review the law and facts, as your bill provided, judge the credibility of witnesses, and so on.

Mr. ELSTON. By the time you get through all of those courts there is really no reason for the Judical Council to review anything except questions of law.

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, that is the way we feel about it.

Mr. ELSTON. And that is exactly what a United States circuit court of appeals would do?

Dr. MORGAN. Exactly. We followed along that line.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like to ask you this question. I think it was since you completed your hearings that a case has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Dr. MORGAN. The Hirschberg case?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes. To the effect that a person who has left the service, that is, who has been separated from the service, cannot be tried subsequently by a military court for an offense committed prior to such separation.

Mr. KILDAY. Even though he has reenlisted?

Mr. ELSTON. Even though he has reenlisted.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, you have not anything in your bill covering that?

Dr. MORGAN. One thing we have about that is in the case of desertion. If he has deserted in the earlier service, then the fact that he has been discharged from a later service does not deprive the court of jurisdiction.

Mr. ELSTON. Yes. He may have even committed a murder within 3 days of his separation from the service.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right. We have not covered that.

Mr. ELSTON. He reenlists and cannot be tried for it.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. I think this committee can write something into the law that will take care of that ridiculous situation.

Dr. MORGAN. Of course, the Supreme Court put it on the basis of the interpretation of the present statute, as I remember it, and that is that Congress did not intend to have the jurisdiction exercised over the man after he had once been discharged.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, I do not think Congress ever intended anything of the kind.

Dr. MORGAN. I know, but that is what they said. There was not anything in the statute which saved the jurisdiction, and, of course, they interpreted it that way.

Mr. ELSTON. Another question, Professor: Is any provision made for reviewing, we will say, World War II cases?

Digitized by Google

Dr. MORGAN. No. We have not touched that. This is prospective.

Mr. ELSTON. No reference to that at all?.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right. This will be prospective.

Mr. ELSTON. Is a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps set up?

Dr. MORGAN. No; we have not touched the corps proposition. That was not in our precept. We have not done anything with reference to what you passed concerning the corps in the Army. We do not touch that. That was a part of the amendment to the National Defense Act.

Mr. ELSTON. I see.

Dr. MORGAN. We did not touch that.

The Navy of course has no separate department, as you know, and the Air Force follows the Navy practice in that respect.

Mr. LARKIN. They have a Department.

Dr. MORGAN. Do they have now?

Mr. LARKIN. Yes.

Dr. MORGAN. Well, the question is whether you think a separate corps should be set up in the various services. That is the point. And as I understood it, the Elston bill inserted that provision on the ground that that was the only effective way of stopping command control.

Mr. VINSON. But that is not dealt with at all in this bill?

Mr. LARKIN. No, sir.

Dr. MORGAN. No, we have not dealt with it.

Mr. BROOKS. That would require additional legislation?

Dr. MORGAN. That will require additional legislation, yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. It would not require additional legislation as far as the Army is concerned.

Dr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. It is already provided for in the law that was passed by the last session of Congress.

Just one other question. May I ask what these other budgetary objections were that the Secretary referred to?

Dr. MORGAN. What objection did they have?

Mr. ELSTON. Something about the Budget Bureau objections.

Dr. MORGAN. Well, the first objection was the one that I suggested to you. They thought that our proposal that the appointment by the Judicial Council within the Department rather than by the President was one that they could not pass. I do not know on what basis.

Mr. Forrestal thought that that objection might be well taken and that the appointment ought to be made by the President. And as I told you here, I agree with Mr. Forrestal's decision on that.

Mr. ELSTON. I agree with his decision, but I, for the life of me, cannot see what the Bureau of the Budget has to do with writing a military justice code.

Dr. MORGAN. I am a layman. I could not see it. But I know that that was one of the questions that they raised and Mr. Forrestal——

Mr. RIVERS. Like Mr. Kilday I had the honor of sitting under our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Ohio, and from what I heard this morning, I am glad to see that the bill which our committee reported out last year had such a large approbation by your group, even though we had the complete opposition of the Army and they brought the largest guns they had, of all caliber, to oppose it.

Digitized by Google

But we had then the determination, which this committee always has, to do the right thing and I believe we did. We had the American bar behind us and we had the judge advocates from every place you can conceive of.

And with the setting up of independent training for the judge advocate and that separate set-up away from the chain of command, and so forth, it seems to me as if this could be called the Elston bill as amended.

Dr. MORGAN. Well, I am not prepared to deny it.

Mr. RIVERS. And I do recall the subsequent history of the bill, as it went over to the other and lesser body.

We had to even go there and bring it out. To bring credit to my friend, Mr. Elston, it was opposed over there even by the then chairman. So I am glad you brought it in and I can assure you——

Mr. BROOKS. May I interject this thought: I was also a member of the Elston committee.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right, the chairman was a very important member.

So the old saying comes to life: "As long as the light holds out to burn, it is time for the vilest sinner to return."

It makes me feel that the Army has come back and is now helping us, and everybody is happy. I do believe from your say-so this is a good bill, and it makes me feel good.

And I am going to stop with this statement: You established your record from the very beginning and whatever the court says goes down on the record so it can be appealable.

Dr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. RIVERS. And it is a good thing.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Anderson, do you have some questions?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions which I wish to ask, but I am afraid time will not permit today. I was particularly interested in this subject of enlisted men serving on a court martial and it might become rather involved before we get through with it.

Mr. BROOKS. Professor, could you be back in the morning?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes, sir, if you desire.

Mr. BROOKS. Just proceed, and then we can take up tomorrow——

Mr. VINSON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, we take a recess now and ask the professor to come back, and we will have other witnesses as well tomorrow. And I would like for the committee to have the benefit of the professor's opinion on these sections as we read the bill a little bit later on.

And I trust we will try to expedite the hearings so as not to inconvenience the professor very much.

So, Mr. Chairman, I suggest we take a recess now until tomorrow.

Mr. BROOKS. Before we do that, Mr. Chairman, may I say this: Our able staff member here has handed me the names of the witnesses tomorrow. We are going to have Professor Morgan and Mr. Arthur Farmer, of the War Veterans Bar Association; Mr. Richard Wels, of New York County Bar Association; Mr. Fred Bryan, of the New York City Bar Association; and Mr. Franklin Riter, of the American Legion. They will all be here tomorrow as witnesses.

We will then adjourn until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:45 p. m., the committee adjourned until Tuesday, March 8, 1949 at 10 a. m.)

UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE No. 1,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a. m., Hon. Overton Brooks (chairman of Subcommittee No. 1) presiding.

Mr. BROOKS. The committee will come to order.

Yesterday, when the committee adjourned, Professor Morgan was a witness testifying and we adjourned to hear him today. I understand, though, Professor Morgan, that you will be in Washington and would be available at a later date and that some of the witnesses who are here today are from distant points and have remained over and have to go back to their respective homes. If there is no objection and it is all right with Professor Morgan, I would like to proceed to take their statements and then we can go back, unless the committee objects to passing him over.

Mr. ANDERSON. I had several questions that I wanted to ask Professor Morgan, but if it is not inconveniencing him and he will be here then it is perfectly all right to hear the other witnesses.

Dr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have to leave this evening, but I will come back at any time the committee wants me.

Mr. ANDERSON. The point is I do not want to inconvenience anyone and if there are witnesses here who can only be here today, I think the chairman is right in hearing them first.

Dr. MORGAN. I will be at the command of the committee at any time.

Mr. BROOKS. My thought is this and I leave it to the members of the committee: In the event the House is not in session this afternoon we could meet back in here to hear Mr. Morgan this afternoon.

Mr. ANDERSON. I cannot, Mr. Chairman, because of two other committee meetings that I promised to attend this afternoon.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, you could be back, then, could you, Professor Morgan?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. We are going to need you anyway.

Dr. MORGAN. Whenever you want me to.

Mr. BROOKS. On the consideration of this bill.

Then we can let you know when to come back?

Dr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. And if you care to remain around here, it is entirely possible we can reach you before noon.

Dr. MORGAN. All right, I will stay here until noon, at any rate.

Mr. BROOKS. All right, thank you.

The committee then will call Mr. Frederick P. Bryan, chairman, special committee on military justice of the Bar Association.

Mr. Bryan, just have a seat.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

STATEMENT OF FREDERICK P. BRYAN, CHAIRMAN, SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON MILITARY JUSTICE OF THE BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I speak here this morning as chairman of the special committee on military justice of the Bar Association of the city of New York. That association is the senior bar association in New York and has more than 4,750 members throughout the greater city. I may say that my remarks here this morning are not alone the views of the committee, but they are endorsed by the association and have been thoroughly debated before that association in open meeting.

Now we have been studying the question of military justice from the viewpoint as practicing lawyers for a very considerable space of time. We have lived through the Elston bill hearings. We have been through very carefully and consulted with many of the boards that have studied this question since the last war. And as lawyers, we are deeply concerned with this bill from the standpoint of administration of justice.

Nevertheless, we are entirely cognizant of the fact that there are practical military necessities and we are well aware that we are not dealing with justice in the abstract but that we are dealing with military justice in the armed services. And I may say in that connection and merely perhaps by way of qualification of my being here that I myself served in the Air Force for three and a half years overseas in the last war. I was deputy chief of the staff of the Second Air Division of the Air Force. We had 1,000 heavy bombers and between 400 and 500 fighters and some 55,000 officers and men engaged in combat operations. And during that period all of the court-martial cases, that is the general courts, passed over my desk as one of my duties. And I, myself, have acted in every capacity in a general court martial: as law member, as trial judge advocate, as defense council, as president of the court, and as member of the court. I say that only because I am not talking pure theory. I think that I and the other members of my committee and the people with whom we consulted on these questions are practical military men.

Now, I do not think there is any serious question any more as to the need for court-martial reform. I am not going into that question. The very fact that your committee is sitting on this proposed code and the very fact that the proposed code has been drawn is indicative of the need. And the question before your committee as we see it is, therefore, whether this proposed code of military justice accomplishes the necessary essential reforms.

Now, we believe that this is a very fine bill. The committee which drew it and its staff—the assistant secretaries on the committee, Professor Morgan and his associates—have done a very remarkable piece of legislative draftsmanship. We think it is a great improvement on all previous legislation of this character. And we believe that in general it provides a workable and uniform code for the administration of military justice and in this respect alone it fulfills a very long-felt need. It makes a number of important changes in the system, almost every one of which is salutary and good. And it is also as far as clarification and arrangement is concerned a very fine piece of legislation.

Now you wish I could go further and say to you gentlemen that in our judgment this was the ultimate answer to the military justice question. Unfortunately we cannot do that, for reasons which I will come to later. But first I want to comment on a few of the excellent specific provisions of the bill which we think are of great importance here and to repeat again to you gentlemen that this bill is a very good bill as far as it goes and we are behind it, with the exception that I will mention later.

Now one of the major criticisms that appeared in almost every report on military justice and in fact voiced by almost every officer and enlisted man who had intimate contact with it is the frequency with which the accused was represented by defense counsel who did not have the capacity, no matter how good their intentions, to adequately protect the rights of the accused. The selection of defense counsel was often done haphazardly and I am frank to say to you gentlemen from my own experience in many cases you went over the list of officers and you suddenly found a fellow over here who was not doing much of anything useful and you said; "We can spare him and we can throw him in as defense counsel, he hasn't much to do."

Now this bill seeks to correct that situation and correct it very effectively. It provides, as you gentlemen are aware, that the defense council be a qualified legal specialist—a trained lawyer in effect—and he must be fully competent to protect the rights of the accused and to protect his client. That may seem an unimportant thing to you gentlemen, or some of you, but all of you who are lawyers realize how vital it is if you are going to have justice that you have competent representation of the accused. For example, the provision in the bill providing that defense counsel may file briefs on an appeal is a particularly good one and I think will protect the rights of the accused on appeal. The new set-up of the courts, whereby you have a law officer on the one hand who exercises judicial function and the lay members of the court—we will call them that for want of a better name—on the other who in effect perform the functions of a jury, is excellent. I think that that serves again as a measure of protection to the accused. It prevents to some extent a stampeding of the court by undue influence from the commander which sometimes happens, and I am going to discuss that later, and also it makes for a record that is intelligible on an appeal and a record on which a board of review can act and pick out the various rulings of the law on questions of law and on questions of evidence and to proceed on an intelligent appraisement of the course of the trial.

The provisions of the code as to review are in general good. We think particularly they are a great improvement on the review provisions in the Elston bill. The Elston Act we felt had rather cumbersome review provisions which were difficult to understand and we felt would be extremely difficult to operate in practice. The system of having a single board of review with appropriate branches in each of the armed services and a simple review procedure where the board of review can pass upon questions of weight of evidence as well as questions strictly of law I think is very good. I think there is one minor criticism that might be made there and that is the provision in section 66–E which provides that if the Judge Advocate General disagrees in essence with the finding of a board of review he may then take the matter and refer it to another of his boards of review for reconsideration. That seems to me to be sort of a double-take proposition and I do not think 66–E is a very salutary provision.

Mr. RIVERS. I want to ask in that connection, if you will recall last year, in the Elston bill which we think was pretty good legislation we wanted to make the judge advocate independent from all the chain of command.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

Mr. RIVERS. And I think that is a good thing. But if he is independent and free from any of the general staff or whatever you want to call it—the hierarchy—he will be more in the position like the Supreme Court. He will be free to give the best of his judgment without any fear of reprisal, so to speak.

Mr. BRYAN. Congressman Rivers, I could not agree with you more——

Mr. RIVERS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. On the question of the independence of the judge advocate general's arm. I am going to come to that a little later in more detail.

Mr. RIVERS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. But I do feel that the independence of the judge advocate general is of prime importance here.

Mr. RIVERS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. In the whole picture.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right, sir.

Mr. BRYAN. I am going to touch on it a little later in another connection, if I may.

Mr. RIVERS. Therefore, if he is independent, maybe there would not be such criticism as might come up under 66–E, as you referred to. Would you not agree with me on that?

Mr. BRYAN. I think that might be so, Congressman.

Mr. RIVERS. There would be that tendency, at any rate.

Mr. BRYAN. I think that might be so, sir.

Nevertheless, I think if the judge advocate general invests in the board of review, particularly when it is composed of a competent board of officers, the authority to pass on a question, you should not have second guessing on it. I think that ought to be final and binding, unless there is something outside of the record that might induce him to do that.

Now we come to the second branch of the review machinery, which is the judicial council. It seems to me to have what is in essence a supreme court of military justice under the National Military Establishment composed of men of judicial caliber, because the requirements for members of the judicial council and the perquisites and compensation given them give them the position for all practical purposes of United States circuit court of appeals judges, is in my judgment highly salutary.

As you gentlemen know, a bill was introduced in the Senate which was designed to permit appeals to circuit courts of appeals from any person feeling aggrieved by a decision of a court martial in the last war.

Digitized by Google

I would not comment on the merits of that bill. It opens up a very wide field to our already overburdened circuit courts of appeal if we have that legislation. I mention that in that connection merely because if you have this judicial council of the stature which this bill makes it, then and in that event you are going to limit in my judgment most of the cry for purely nonmilitary review of court-martial decisions. You may very well avoid situations such as have arisen in two United States district courts recently where the Military Establishment has been very severely criticized by sitting judges for prejudice, or injustice, and for domination of the courts by a commanding officer. I, myself, do not feel that we want a general appeal to the civilian courts, but I do think we want a body of qualified judicial officers within the national military establishment of judicial caliber to act as the final court of review, for two reasons: One, in individual cases and two, because with such a body you gradually evolve a system of case law for the Military Establishment which would be of immeasurable value to all of the armed services in the various specific situations that occur.

In other words, no code is the complete answer to a legal picture. You cannot try cases by a code. You have to develop in all law a body of precedents which will govern the various situations that arise in the administration of military justice. Then there is the salutary provision that the supreme judicial council meeting with the various judge advocates of the armed services will make continuous observation of the system and make recommendations for its proper administration and improvement.

Now that again is an excellent thing because you gentlemen who are much more experienced in legislation than I am know very well that any new code requires ironing out of little things which arise through its practical experience, requiring minor amendments here and there and requiring procedural changes. In New York, for example, we have a judicial council for many years which makes recommendations with respect to the New York Civil Practice Act and the administration of justice there. It is making constant improvements in our procedural system and various recommendations as to our substantive system.

Mr. DURHAM. May I ask a question right there?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Durham.

Mr. DURHAM. Do you think that this judicial board should go beyond the authority given in the present act in reviewing only the law and not reviewing the facts?

Mr. BRYAN. I am inclined to think, sir, that it is not necessary to have that board review the facts. Let me put it this way: If a situation arises in which there are no facts to sustain a conviction, then as I see it that becomes a question of law anyway.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Now once you start going beyond that, I think, you place an intolerable burden on the judicial council more than it can possibly handle because everything goes up. We have had the same experience in New York, for instance, with respect to appeals to our court of appeals. If there were not an intermediate court—an appellate division—where we stop at questions of fact a single court of appeals would just be so overburdened even as a practical matter that they could not handle the load. And I think with a judicial council of this nature and with competent boards of review as intermediate appellate bodies it is not necessary to have the final arbiter review questions of fact. The Supreme Court of the United States does not do that either, of course. Does that not answer your question?

Digitized by Google

Mr. DURHAM. Yes.

Mr. RIVERS. You appeal from the record anyway, do you not?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, surely, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. RIVERS. And the record begins from the beginning of the trial, under this act.

Mr. BRYAN. They have the complete record before them.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right.

Mr. BRYAN. Right, sir.

Now, I have said a good deal for this bill. I could say a great deal more, but I know you gentlemen have only limited time.

I now want to come to what I feel is the major deficiency. All of you gentlemen have heard arguments pro and con with respect to this controversial question of command control. We have felt for a long time, in fact all the way through our studies of this problem, that the question of command control was perhaps the most vital single point in military justice reform. For example, we were disappointed, frankly, in the Elston bill in that respect. We felt that the Elston bill, while setting up an independent judge advocate's department, as Congressman Rivers mentioned a moment ago, nevertheless had not transferred to that independent judicial arm the functions that were necessary to remove the possibility of command influencing or dominating the courts.

Now, the fact is, gentlemen, and I do not think it can be seriously contradicted, that on occasion in the past and sometimes with the best motives in the world—and I am not criticizing the motives of commanders—command has influenced or dominated the court, a court composed of officers whose whole military future lies in the hands of the man appointing them.

Mr. ELSTON. May I ask right there—

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. How do you figure a commanding officer could influence a separate judge advocate general's corps?

Mr. BRYAN. I think, sir, it would be very difficult for him to influence the separate judge advocate general's corps. As I understand this bill, it does not create for all of the armed services a separate and independent judge advocate general's corps, in the same sense that the Elston Act did for the Army. But the members of the court of course are not members of the Judge Advocate General's Department. The members of the court under this system are officers under the direct command of the convening authority. They are officers pulled from various units within his command and appointed by him to do a specific job, which is to sit on a court-martial on one or a series of cases.

Now, those officers are dependent on their commanding officer for what? No. 1, for promotion; No. 2, for efficiency reports; No. 3, for leaves; No. 4, for assignments; and No. 5, for that little miscellany of things where the beneficence of a commanding officer toward an officer is of paramount importance.

Digitized by Google

Mr. ELSTON. How does the pending bill change that?

Mr. BRYAN. The pending bill does not, sir, and that is precisely my point here. The pending bill does not change that and that, sir, I believe to be the major deficiency in the pending bill.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, it would seem to me if you get a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps you remove it from influence much more than you would under the pending bill.

Mr. BRYAN. I think that is so, sir. You have to have two things, though, it seems to me. One is a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps. That gives the Judge Advocate General his measure of independence so he can act in a judicial capacity throughout. Now you have to place in the hands of the independent Judge Advocate General's Corps which you created the functions which will enable him to carry out that judicial function which you have given him. One of those functions, and a very important function, is the appointment of the court itself. And what I advocate here before your committee is that this bill—the uniform code— be modified so that an independent Judge Advocate General's arm will appoint the members of the court. Thus the court will not be appointed by a commander who has complete control over the military future of the men on that court. It will be appointed from panels submitted by various commanders to a Judge Advocate General's convening authority. That panel may be selected from a wide variety of units so as to give a broad selection of court members in specific situations If you do that, sir; and if in addition to that you have the defense counsel appointed by the Judge Advocate General's Department; and, thirdly, withdraw from the commander the initial power of review except as to clemency on the one hand or remission of sentence on the other, then you have an independent branch as you just described, Congressman, with functions which enable it to act in a judicial and objective capacity.

Mr. DURHAM. Suppose you gave the judicial council under this bill the full authority to review all facts and law and everything else; would you not get away from command influence to a large extent?

Mr. BRYAN. I think to some extent, sir. As a matter of fact, this bill has a number of features to it which are designed to protect against command influence. But command influence, sir, is a very subtle thing. A commander, as you gentlemen well know, does not get his court to go in a room and say, "Gentlemen, I want you to bring in a verdict" or "I want you to bring in a sentence of some sort or kind." It is a very subtle process. And the removal of the appointing power—this reviewing power—from command is the thing that is going to cut the Gordian knot, in my opinion.

Mr. RIVERS. We think that Mr. Elston did a very fine job on this particular legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. No question about that.

Mr. RIVERS. He did such as good job that he had to go over to the Senate and help to get through over there.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. RIVERS. And we had the complete unsupport of the military.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I know that.

Mr. RIVERS. But we think we got a fine bill, considering the many obstacles that were very beneficently tossed in our unsuspecting path, if you catch the point.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Elston did a very good job, we think, and tha is why we are making him sit with us. We feel that with your help and the other people that want to do the right thing, we can put i these safeguards.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. RIVERS. And I say that without any reflection on the military

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, Congressman; none at all.

Mr. RIVERS. None at all; that is right.

Mr. BRYAN. I know that commanding officers who on occasio felt it was necessary to bring pressure on a court here and there we not doing it with any malice. They were doing it for what the thought was the best interest of their command.

Mr. RIVERS. And self-preservation is just as strong today as it w a million years ago.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. You know, there is much that a Federal judge ca do which brings a little pressure on a jury, too, but as long as the ca can be reviewed it has always been felt that they could correct a errors thay may have been committed in the district court. You ca not remove a court-martial hearing entirely from every possibility influence.

Mr. BRYAN. You cannot, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. But, if you have a complete review of law and fa do you not think that will assure a fair trial?

Mr. BRYAN. I think, if I may use the illustration you used a mome ago, Congressman, the Federal judge and the jury, the great differen between the Federal judge and the jury and the commander and t court is this: If the Federal judge makes any remarks to that jur they are all made on the record, and that record goes up to the appella court and is before it. If the commander is inclined to influence b court, (a) the commander is not there at the trial, and (b) the cor mander is not talking to the court directly or talking to it in t courtroom. Therefore, any attempt by the commander to influen or dominate the court does not appear on the record. So it is difficul if not impossible, for a reviewing board to catch that and pass on i

Mr. ELSTON. Well, the record in a trial in a United States cou does not indicate the emphasis.

Mr. BRYAN. I agree to that.

Mr. ELSTON. Does not indicate the attitude of the court.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Does not indicate sometimes that he is a prosecutin officer as well as the court. I think you have seen it yourself.

Mr. BRYAN. I certainly have.

Mr. BROOKS. Besides, Mr. Bryan, the rules of the Federal cou permit the trial judge to go very far in expressing himself in crimin cases.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

Mr. BROOKS. And frequently he suggests to the jury that if the bring in certain verdicts he will order a new trial.

Mr. BRYAN. But that again is a situation where the judge, wh corresponds now to the law officer under this new code, makes certa statements. And I grant you, Congressman Elston, you cannot catc those shadings on the record, as all of us who have tried cases know evertheless, the words, at least, are on the record. And, when we lk of the commander, the words are not a part of the record at all. hey are completely extrarecord, and nobody knows what was said, id no reviewing authority has anything before it.

Now I have taken I think more time perhaps before you gentlemen ian I should have. I want to say this to you. It seems to me, as r as the command function is concerned, the requirements of military scipline are completely sad if the following things happen: A commanding officer has an accused arrested, charges are preferred against m, and the case is referred for trial. There is the dividing line. nce the case is referred for trial, no longer has the commander any terest in the case except to see that objective justice is done. It ems to me that the argument for retention in command of the power appoint the courts is perhaps only for one reason: That the retention the power carries with it the ability to influence or dominate. Now, iat ability to influence or dominate is something that the command savows.

Mr. ELSTON. May I ask a question right there, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Elston.

Mr. ELSTON. What would you do with a commander at an isolated ost where it is not easy to assemble a court? If the Judge Advocate eneral has to do the assignment and has to convene a court from reat distance, and particularly during wartime, might not an accused erson be compelled to languish in jail for an unreasonable length of me?

Mr. BRYAN. I think it is entirely possible, sir, that where you have n isolated post the accused may conceivably suffer by being in jail longer period than would normally be the case. I think, however, iat is compensated for by this: If a man is accused of a major offense, e is no longer any good to the commander at that point. What the ommander wants is to get him out of the way; that is, out of his hair, you want to put it that way, as rapidly as possible. That is largely question of transportation. Very rarely do you have a general ourt martial in a relatively front-line situation. In most cases, lmost all cases, the man goes to the rear echelon and is tried there here a court can be summoned from a wide body of men appointed y a Judge Advocate General. I think, Congressman, that is largely question of transportation rather than languishing in jail. And here may be cases where transportation is so inadequate that there is long stay in the "hoosegow," if you want to put it that way.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask you this——

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Bryan, would you not lose the element of knowledge of local influence in selecting your personnel if you turn it over to the Judge Advocate General's Corps, we will say, which might be set up at a distant point and not know the temperament and the local environment or the local conditions of the members of the panel?

Mr. BRYAN. I think in the first place, Congressman, that the temperament and local conditions in general are not overly conducive to objective justice.

Mr. BROOKS. We lawyers jealously guard the right to go down the venire and interrogate the talesmen——

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BROOKS. Of a prospective jury, however. We think that that has a great deal to do with fundamental justice; is that not true?

Mr. BRYAN. I think that is right, sir. But, if I may put it this way, we have also to draw a distinction, I think, Congressman, in our thinking between a local jury and a panel of officers under the direct command of the commander who is directing the trial. In other words, a local jury which was appointed out of the sheriff's office or was appointed out of the public prosecutor's office might be a local jury, but I think you might agree with me, Congressman, when I say that I at least, and I think you would, too; would be reluctant to try the accused before a jury composed of such persons. And that, in my judgement, is the distinction.

Did I answer you?

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very kindly for that answer.

Mr. BRYAN. I will just finish up here very briefly.

I think we have to realize, gentlemen, and I know you gentlemen do, that the American armed services are no longer the old type of professional Army. They are citizen armed services. Their fighting capacity is dependent on morale. And those gentlemen of you who have heard some of the gripes—and Heaven only knows the American soldier gripes, and I hope he always will, because if he does not grip there is something wrong with him—are familiar with the criticism that has arisen from men subject to the old court-martial system. In my judgment it was not conducive to the best morale. Morale will never be so high as when the individual American soldier or sailor or airman is convinced that he is going to get a fully square deal if he is accused of a crime or offense and that he is going to be tried under a system of justice which is in accord with the traditional philosophy to which he has been accustomed. That is not going to interfere with his military efficiency. Far from doing that, it is going to increase his military efficiency. And we therefore urge upon this committee the passage of the proposed uniform code of military justice, H. R. 2498, with the addition of the safeguards that I have described to you gentlemen, which is only a comparatively small step forward procedurally but a very large step forward in actual effect. Remove from command the power to appoint the court, the power to appoint defense counsel, and the power to make initial review except for clemency or remission of sentence. As modified, I believe such a bill will be a really monumental piece of legislation.

Thank you for your patience.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very kindly, Mr. Bryan, for a very fine statement.

Mr. Anderson, I do not think you asked any questions. Do you have any you want to ask?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make it plain to the committee and the witnesses that I am not a lawyer. I am a farmer. I am to sit here and listen to what all the lawyers have to say and then have to come up with an answer.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Gavin here is a member of the committee. Mr. Gavin, would you have any questions right now?

Mr. GAVIN. No. I am sorry I did not hear the earlier part of your statement. It was very, very good and I listened with a great deal of interest.

Mr. BRYAN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. We are pleased to have also Mr. Doyle with us. Mr. Doyle, do you have any questions? Mr. Doyle is a lawyer and is from California.

Mr. DOYLE. I appreciate the courtesy of sitting with this subcommittee while not being a member of it. There are two things that occurred to me, Mr. Chairman. I am interested in article 67, which provides that only lawyers who are admitted to practice before the United States Supreme Court shall be appointed to the counsel.

Speaking as a western man, that provision would eliminate from consideration many of the most brilliant lawyers we have, some of whom are west of the Mississippi River. Very few men in the western part of our country are ever admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States. I happen to be, and have been for about 20 years.

But I know that is a practical problem, and I raise the point before the committee that that might be considered as not necessary.

Mr. BROOKS. Do you care to comment on that?

Mr. BRYAN. I have not, frankly, Congressman, given it much thought. I think perhaps I view it from an easterner's point of view. I had not perhaps realized those considerations that you mentioned.

I think the important thing or the object was to get the very top layer of the bar, if you want to call it, by way of qualification. Now, it does not seem to me to be vital that the man be admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States.

I, myself, know a number of very able lawyers that have never been before the Supreme Court.

Mr. RIVERS. Had no reason to be.

Mr. BRYAN. And had no reason to ask to be admitted because they just did not happen to get there.

Mr. DOYLE. I am glad you agree with me.

May I ask this other question, Mr. Chairman. I have never practiced before a court martial, but I am in an area where there are many courts martial, and I have personal knowledge of the fact that many boys are given court-martial judgments of dishonorable discharge.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. DOYLE. Boys of immature age and boys who only commit offenses as the result of stress and strain of war or of unusual circumstances which immaturity is the cause of rather than deliberate design or deliberate intention to commit a serious offense.

I would feel, Mr. Chairman, that under section (e), article 67, which limits the Judicial Council to considering matters of law only—if you will notice subdivision (e).

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. DOYLE. I wonder if Mr. Bryan would not differentiate that section for us. It seems to me that opens up the Judicial Council for consideration of facts as well as law, does it not?

Mr. BRYAN. Well, Congressman Doyle, where you have a lack of sufficient evidence to support the findings, for all practical purposes I think that means that there are no facts in law sufficient to support them. In other words, you review the facts.

You might almost say that you apply the old scintilla rule. You say there is not a scintilla of evidence to support these findings. I think that is what that means. That is my impression.

Digitized by Google

Mr. DOYLE. Would you not feel that in the absence of a review board, being named by the judge advocate's office, that the Judicial Council should also have the power to review the facts as an essential element to get away from the danger of command influence?

Mr. BRYAN. Let me put it this way, Congressman: It would seem to me that the review boards should be appointed by the Judge Advocate General's Department as part of an independent judicial arm.

And if the review boards were so appointed, that it seems to me would fulfill the requirement that you just mentioned. Now in the absence of that it might very well be that this committee would want to give consideration to enlarging the jurisdiction of the Judicial Council.

But what I am afraid of, as I said before, sir, is that you have a court composed of three men and when you have a court composed of three men sitting on a judicial system covering 2,000,000 plus you are going to have them so crowded that I have some concern as to whether they will be able to do the proper job if you enlarge their jurisdiction to that extent.

Mr. DOYLE. May I just make this one statement, Mr. Chairman. I would feel that it might be a hardship on the Judicial Council, but if there was a miscarriage of justice as the result of the Judicial Council not being enabled to consider the facts and it was your son or my son that was involved, you would not worry about the heavy load on the Judicial Council.

Mr. BRYAN. There is no question about it.

Mr. DOYLE. I would like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, with your courtesy, that I feel very strongly that a military court is not comparable to a civilian court and that we ought to permit the Judicial Council to review the facts as well as the law.

Mr. BRYAN. I certainly, if I may say so, would have no strong dissent on that score at all. And if I may say one other thing: It does seem to me that the independence of the review board is an important factor in the consideration of how much power, that is how much scope or jurisdiction, you are going to give to the Judicial Council.

Mr. GAVIN. As the gentleman states, he approves of H. R. 2498. You summarized in the latter part of your statement certain recommendations. Would you reiterate those statements again?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir.

We propose the following modifications of the bill as written. No. 1, that the commander who is now the convening authority at whatever level do the following: (a) of course, have the accused arrested; (b) go through the process of having the charges preferred, and (c) refer the case for trial, at which point—the man having been referred to trial—an independent judicial system along the lines of Congressman Elston's very excellent system, take over, and that the independent judicial arm, which we will call the Judge Advocate General's Department, then appoint the court from a panel of officers submitted to it and selected by commanders in the various units under that judicial convening authority; (2) that it appoint defense counsel; and (3) when that record goes up for review it passes through the commander's hands merely for purposes of possible exercise of clemency or remission of sentence, and then passes directly to a reviewing authority for confirmation or whatever process may take place. That reviewing authority, of course, is a part of the independent judicial arm.

Digitized by Google

Mr. GAVIN. What is your recommendation for defense counsel for the accused?

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I think that the present provisions as to qualifications of defense counsel are excellent. The thing that concerns me is that defense counsel is still appointed under this bill—article 26 I believe—by the convening authority who is the commander.

In other words, the defense counsel is appointed in effect by the very man who is responsible for preferring the charges. That, I think, is wrong. I do not think the defense counsel should be so appointed.

Mr. GAVIN. What is your recommendation on that?

Mr. BRYAN. My recommendations are that the defense counsel be appointed by the judicial arm—the independent Judge Advocate General's Department. And I may point out to this committee, as I understand it in recent English legislation on this same subject, which I think is going to be discussed before this committee at some length a little later, they set up in the Judge Advocate General's Department, so concerned are they with the rights of the accused, two separate departments: One, a Department of Prosecution and two, a Department of Defense, so that you do not get one unit prosecuting and defending, at the same time. I think that is another matter that your committee wants to study.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Mr. Bryan. We are intensely interested in your statement and we appreciate your coming here.

The committee has four more witnesses, by the way, to be heard before noon, and I think if the committee desires, we can proceed rapidly with them so as to hear all of them and so as not to keep them over an extra day.

Mr. BRYAN. May I, Mr. Chairman, express my thanks to your committee for your courtesy and consideration to me. I have enjoyed appearing before you very much, indeed.

Mr. BROOKS. You have made a very fine statement, sir.

Mr. BRYAN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Richard H. Wels, chairman of the special committee on military justice of the New York County Bar Association. Mr. Wels.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD H. WELS, CHAIRMAN, SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON MILITARY JUSTICE OF THE NEW YORK COUNTY LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. WELS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I shall try to be brief.

I am appearing before you as a representative of the New York County Lawyers' Association and speak to you as a chairman of the association's special committee on military justice.

I should like to point out that all of the members of our committee saw active service overseas during World War II, and that they are presently Reserve officers of the Army, Air Force, and Navy.

I myself am a lieutenant in the United States Naval Reserve, but the views expressed by me here are, of course, not to be construed as the views of the Navy Department.

With the permission of the committee, I should like to place in the record a copy of the report made by our committee last fall containing our recommendations to the group headed by Professor Morgan which drafted the bill now before you.

This report, which was made at the invitation of Professor Morgan, met with the full approval of our association.

(The report referred to follows:)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY JUSTICE OF THE NEW YORK COUNTY LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION

Earlier this year Secretary of Defense James V. Forrestal appointed a committee consisting of Prof. Edmund M. Morgan, Jr., of the Harvard Law School as chairman, Under Secretary of the Navy W. John Kenney, Assistant Secretary of the Army Gordon Gray, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force Eugene M. Zuckert, and Felix E. Larkin, assistant general counsel of the Department of Defense, as executive secretary, to draft a Code of Military Justice uniform in substance and uniform in interpretation and application to all of the armed services. In his precept establishing this committee, the Secretary indicated that this uniform code should protect the rights of those subject to the code without impairing the performance of military functions.

Having noted the previous activities of this association in the field of military and naval justice, the Morgan committee on September 27, 1948, invited the association to submit our recommendations with respect to deficiencies in the present Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy. Upon referral of Professor Morgan's letter to our committee, we have carefully reviewed our earlier reports on military justice, the changes effected by the Elston bill enacted in the closing days of the second session of the Eightieth Congress, and the proceedings before the House and Senate Committees on the Armed Services, and have generally studied the problems of military and naval justice.

The limitations and inadequacies of our systems of military and naval justice were graphically portrayed to the public and to Members of Congress during and after World War II by many service men and women, lawyers and laymen alike, who had had first-hand experience with the operation of such systems, and found that resemblance between them and the courts which they knew as civilians was largely coincidental. It was disturbing to them to find that the same official was empowered to accuse, to draft and direct the charges, to select the prosecutor and defense counsel from the officers under his command, to choose the members of the court, to review and alter their decision, and to change any sentence imposed. They were shocked to learn that an offense committed by an officer was subject to different treatment and punishment than the identical offense committed by an enlisted man. They were surprised to find that many of the judges, prosecutors, and defense counsel participating in courts-martial were neither lawyers nor trained in the law, and that, in the naval services, there was not even the minimum requirement that a single law member be on a court.

The reports that came back of these things to the civilian community, together with specific instances of abuse in the court-martial process, initiated a flow of bills into the congressional hopper and an expression of aroused public opinion which gave promise that reforms would be accomplished. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy each appointed boards of distinguished citizens to review the court-martial systems of their respective services, and to make recommendations for a thoroughgoing revision of military and naval justice. The famous Vanderbilt report, made to Secretary Patterson, and the Ballantine and Keeffe reports, made to Secretary Forrestal, all found substance to the charges which had been leveled at the court-martial systems, and presented definitive recommendations for the elimination of the conditions which made such charges possible.

The jugular vein at which all such boards aimed their recommendations was the domination and control of the court-martial systems by command. All such boards concluded that amendments to the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy which correct other inadequacies of military and naval justice, but which failed to check command control, effect only secondary reforms which become meaningless in the absence of the rooting out of the major sources of abuse and injustice. As to this, the Vanderbilt committee said:

"The system of military justice laid down in the Manual for Courts Martial not infrequently broke down because of the denial to the courts of independence of action in many instances by the commanding officers who appointed the courts and reviewed their judgments; and who conceived it the duty of command to interfere for disciplinary purposes. Indeed, the general attitude is expressed by the maxim that discipline is a function of command. Undoubtedly, there was in many instances an honest conviction that since the appointing authority was responsible for the welfare and lives of his men, he also had the power to punish them, and consequently the courts appointed by him should carry out his will. We think that this attitude is completely wrong and subversive of morale, and that it is necessary to take steps to guard against the break-down of the system at this point by making such action contrary to the Articles of War or regulations and by protecting the courts from the influence of the officers who authorize and conduct the prosecution."

Implementing this finding, the Vanderbilt committee recommended (a) the appointment of courts by the Judge Advocate General's Department, instead of by command; (b) the assignment of defense counsel by the Judge Advocate General's Department, and the requirement that defense counsel be a trained lawyer; and (c) that the initial review of decisions, except for purposes of clemency, be in the hands of the Judge Advocate General's Department, instead of in the commanding officer who initiated the proceedings and convened the court. Corollary proposals provided that the officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department should be qualified lawyers insulated from the indirect influence of command by having their promotions, assignments, leaves, and fitness reports emanating from the Judge Advocate General's Department rather than from command.

It was felt that once command had filed its accusations and placed a man on trial, the judicial machinery should be in the hands of an independent judicial system within the service which, not subject to pressures and influence from command, would insure the accused the same fair trial by competent personnel that he would receive in our criminal courts if he were a civilian. In this recommendation and belief our association concurred, as well as the American Bar Association, the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, the War Veterans Bar Association, and many other veterans and bar groups.

On February 20, 1947, the War Department completely rejected these recommendations. The position of the Army with respect to them was summarized by Secretary of the Army Kenneth Royall in the Virginia Law Review for May 1947, where he said:

"The War Department feels that the committee received a rather exaggerated impression of the prevalence or seriousness of pressure exerted on courts martial. However, there were doubtless instances where appointing authorities entirely misconceived their duties and functions and overstepped the bounds of propriety."

Extended hearings on the bills relating to the Army court-martial system were held by the House Committee on Armed Services, but no House hearings have been held on the Navy bills. No hearings at all have been held by the Senate Committee. The House committee reported out H. R. 2575, introduced by Representative Elston, of Ohio, at the request of the Army, and this bill in amended form was passed by the House. In the closing days of the second session of the Eighteth Congress, the entire Elston bill was introduced by Senator Kem, of Missouri, as a rider to the Selective Service Act of 1948, and, without the benefit of any Senate hearings, was accepted by the Senate, and signed by the President as Public Law 759 of the Eightieth Congress. It becomes effective on February 1, 1949.

The passage of the Elston bill was hailed on the floor of Congress and in the press as the accomplishment of the reforms in military justice which had been sought by our association, among others. A label of "court martial reform" was placed upon the bill which was scarcely indicative of its contents. Such labeling was highly dangerous in that it gave the public and the press the impression that substantial reforms had been accomplished, and thus reduced the possibility of further congressional action to effect the real reforms which are still lacking. Accordingly, it is important to make clear just what the Elston bill accomplished.

First of all, it must be noted that even such reforms as are effected by the Elston bill have no application to the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, and, probably, the Air Force. Just as the changes in military justice which were adopted in 1921 were restricted in their application to the Army, so the Elston bill is piecemeal legislation.

The most important phase of the Elston bill to our mind is such change as it has effected in the relation of command to the courts-martial systems. Such change is reflected by section 246 of the bill, amending section 8 of the Nation Defense Act (10 U. S. C. 61) to provide for a Judge Advocate General's Corp This provides for a separate corps, headed by a major general and three brigadi generals, which shall have a strength of not less than 1½ percent of the authorize active commissioned-officer strength of the Army, together with such warrar officers and enlisted personnel as may be assigned by the Secretary of the Arm This corps is given its own promotion list, similar to that of the Medical Cor and Chaplains Corps, independent of the line. This was vigorously oppos before Congress by the Army on the ground that thereby too great a preferen was given to officers performing legal duties over line officers. It may be signi cant that the Army has not yet moved to put into operation this or other prov sions of the Elston bill.

The establishment of such a corps, with its own promotion list, has been wide hailed as having established "an independent Judge Advocate General's Depar ment," but this is far from the fact. As was said in an editorial appearing in t August 1948 issue of the American Bar Association Journal:

"The new statute accomplishes some desirable improvements in military justic supplementing those which the Secretary had power to introduce by his own actio along lines recommended by the Vanderbilt committee nominated by our associ tion and appointed by the War Department. The Elston bill creates a Jud Advocate General's Department which is independent in the sense that it h authority to handle its own administrative matters, but, as has been pointed o several times in these columns (33 A. B. A. J. 40, 45, January 1947; 33 A. B. A. 319, April 1947; 33 A. B. A. J. 898, September 1947), command remains co pletely in control of the operation of the Army's courts-martial system."

Under the Elston bill the power to appoint courts remains in command. Und the Elston bill the power to review, in all its aspects, the decisions of court martial remains in the commanding officer who convened the court. Under t Elston bill prosecutors and defense counsel are required to be members of t Judge Advocate General's Department or otherwise qualified lawyers only " available"—a qualification which realistically leaves the situation in status qu We believe that in all instances and in all the services, the prosecutor and defen counsel should be members of the Judge Advocate General's Department otherwise qualified lawyers. So far as the basic fundamental matters at whic the movement for court-martial reform has been aimed, little is accomplished b the Elston bill.

We have reviewed the history and background of these provisions to clear awa the confusion that has been created as a result of the enactment of the Elston bil We come now to our recommendations with respect to the position of command i the court-martial system.

We do not question that discipline is a proper concern of command, just as th commissions of crime in the civilian community is a concern of the executiv authority, represented by the district attorney and the governor. We believ that where a commanding officer has reason to believe that an individual has com mitted an offense, he must have the authority to file charges against that indi vidual and to order him tried by a court of competent jurisdiction, and to b responsible for the prosecution of the offense, such responsibility including desig nation of a qualified prosecutor. We believe that it should continue to be th prerogative of command to evaluate the seriousness of the crime, and determin whether the case shall go before a general court-martial, or a court with lesse powers of punishment. We further believe that, just as the civilian executive the commanding officer should have the power of clemency.

But once the judicial proceedings have been placed in motion, we agree with th opinion expressed by Hamilton in No. 78 of The Federalist that "There is no liber ty, if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers."

We feel that, once the case has been referred by command for trial, the power and control of command must end, save for the right to exercise clemency. Accordingly, we recommend that (1) the power of appointing the court and the defense counsel must rest with the Judge Advocate General's Department; (2) that the personnel serving in such capacity must be free from the authority of command directly, or indirectly in matters of appointment, fitness reports, pro motions, leaves, etc.; and (3) that judicial review of court-martial proceedings shall be in higher echelons of the Judge Advocate General's Department.

A practical problem of major proportions arises with respect to these recom mendations. By law a Judge Advocate General's Department exists in the Regular Army, and the Judge Advocate General, as well as the other officers in e Department, are professional lawyers. Such is not the case in the naval vices or in the Air Force.

While there is a Judge Advocate General of the Navy, neither he not other icers performing legal duties are required to be lawyers. Traditionally, officers igned to legal duties in the naval services are line officers whose tour of duty the Judge Advocate General's office generally comes between other assignments. If there is to be a real system of military or naval justice, it must be administered hin each of the services by a corps of legal specialists from whom each Judge vocate General shall be required to be appointed, and which will provide the members of the courts, the prosecutors, and the defense counsel, all of whom ght to be trained lawyers. Such a corps is already established by law in the my, but it has never existed in the Navy and the Air Force, since its division m the Army, has followed Navy practice in this regard.

Establishment of such a specialist corps in the Navy and in the Air Force is t such a departure from precedent as might be imagined. While the legal tems of those services are today administered by officers who, notwithstanding ir distinguished records and high professional competence as line officers and iators, are generally not trained and experienced in the technical duties assigned m. other specialist functions are performed only by specialists. The Bureau Medicine and Surgery of the Navy and the Office of the Air Surgeon General manned and headed by physicians and surgeons, who may not be so appointed hout a civilian license, and whose life work lies in medicine. The Dental Corps the services are composed of dentists, and the Chaplains Corps are headed and nned by ordained ministers. There are doctors, dentists, and chaplains who major generals, rear admirals, and are accepted as an integral part of the vice without ever having commanded a regiment or a naval vessel. In addi-n, as the result of the specialization which comes from modern warfare, in all vices there are specialists such as communicators who are trained throughout ir careers for a particular specialty. Only in the specialties of law and of elligence has there been some hesitancy in providing for a specialist corps. ose two specialties have been largely considered as part-time jobs to which ior officers, regardless of their lack of professional training as lawyers or intel-ence experts, may be assigned for a brief tour of duty, to return to sea or to craft after a few years.

The Navy has never seen fit to establish a legal corps although in recent years has taken tentative steps in this direction. During wartime it had a group of serve officers classified as legal specialists. Commendably, since the end of orld War II it has sent a selected group of Regular naval officers to first-line schools for legal education, and has made such officers the nucleus of its post-ar legal program.

If the Navy's hesitation to create such a legal corps stems from a desire, with ich we could concur, to have its legal officers deeply imbued with its traditions d needs, the obstacle is not insurmountable. We would endorse a program ich would insure that the Navy's lawyers have duty with fleet units, and be as gnizant of and sympathetic with the problems and requirements of the service its general-duty officers. Such has, in fact, been the history of medical officers, aplains, and other specialists. We can see no reason why such a program would t be practicable with respect to legal specialists. But we are firmly convinced the necessity in all services of having billets concerned with legal duties filled trained and competent personnel. If there is to be any uniformity in the urts-martial systems of the various services, the professional lawyers of the my must be balanced by professional opposite numbers in the Navy and in e Air Force. Accordingly, we recommend that amendments to the law be opted providing for a truly independent legal corps within each of the services. e chiefs of such corps should be appointed from the corps, and not, as at present, om general-duty officers. The assignments, leaves, promotions, and fitness ports of officers in such corps should emanate from their superiors within the rps, and the decisions of the courts on which they sit should be reviewed by gher echelons within the corps and not by command. To our mind, such ovision is the basic need of military and naval justice. Once it is accomplished, ther reforms become mere refinements.

The Elston bill largely restricts its application to general courts martial, and ot special courts, which are the Army equivalent to summary courts martial in e Navy. It is our experience that the greater part of the abuses which have curred in military and naval justice have occurred in Navy summary and Army ecial courts, rather than in general courts martial. This is so because the com-anding officer who has convened the summary or special court does so not because he has any doubt as to the guilt of the accused, but because he feels that he cannot impose a sufficiently severe punishment at mast or company punishment. Frequently, this is conveyed to the court which the commanding officer appoints from his own command and whose decision he reviews. Too often the court is told that it is expected to find a verdict of guilty, and to impose a particular sentence, regardless of the oath that it takes "to well and truly try, without prejudice or partiality, the case now depending, according to the evidence which shall be adduced, the laws for the government of the Navy, and your own conscience." The result is that, although the court is by statute required to enter upon its duties with an open mind as to the guilt of the accused, its judgment is foreclosed in advance, and there is little question as to the ultimate result. This is much less likely to happen in a general court-martial, which is not ordinarily convened by the commanding officer who has instituted the proceedings and is not subject to his control. General courts martial are normally under the control of a general or flag officer senior to the commanding officer who has initiated the proceedings and the officers at his headquarters who participate in the proceeding are unlikely to be affected by the views of the subordinate commander who has recommended the court.

We are strongly of the opinion that all that we have said before as to the necessity of independent, competent lawyers serving as law members, prosecutors, and defense counsel on general courts martial is equally as applicable to Navy summary and Army special courts martial. Those who oppose this find it particularly impracticable in the Navy, where commanding officers of smaller units and ships have the power to convene summary courts martial. Actually, however, a large percentage of such courts are convened on larger vessels such as battleships, cruisers, and aircraft carriers (all of which have several thousand personnel aboard) and on bases where there are many thousands of men. In such ships and on such bases there should be no difficulty about providing adequate legal specialists just as other specialist officers are provided in the allowance list.

At first blush, it sounds convincing that smaller vessels such as landing craft, minesweepers, destroyers, and other vessels which may have no more than half a dozen officers aboard cannot provide and cannot justify such legal specialists. If such smaller craft normally travelled alone, that might well be so. Normally, however, they travel and function in squadrons and divisions, each of which has a flagship aboard which is a squadron commander with a staff duplicating the staff of a fleet commander in miniature. There is no reason why legal specialists cannot be attached to such staffs as are other specialists, and be available for duties in all units of the squadron. We believe that any reform of military and naval justice will be incomplete if it is not applicable to the inferior courts, as well as to the general courts, to the fullest extent practicable.

In the development of a uniform code for all the services, we recommend that a uniform terminology be adopted. Only confusion results from the fact that an Army special court is known to the Navy as a summary court-martial; that an Army trail judge advocate may find as his opposite number a recorder. Adoption of a common terminology will do much toward the development of a uniform approach. Similarly, we recommend that uniform definitions of offenses, and a uniform system of punishments be adopted which will be applicable to all the services.

The Elston bill, in section 210, has made it possible to discipline an officer who has committed an offense by trying him at a special court martial, as well as at a general court martial. This is not as yet true in the Navy where the only punishment that can be meted out to an officer is trial by a general court-martial or a private reprimand from his commanding officer. The effect of this is that where an officer commits a minor offense, he in effect goes unpunished, although an enlisted man committing the same offense is subjected to punishment. Similarly, in the Navy as an administrative measure courts martial are cautioned against confining a petty officer, although a seaman committing an identical offense may and frequently does receive punishment of confinement. We believe that these practices negative our basic concept of "equal justice under law", and we recommend that the law be amended so as to equalize punishments for all service personnel. Such a provision would improve morale and discipline.

The Elston bill has set up a comprehensive and tortuous system of review insofar as Army courts martial are concerned. That system is defective in that it preserves the right of review as to all phases of the case in the commanding officer who convened the court. This is completely at odds with American concepts of justice.

Digitized by Google

We recommend that a uniform system of review be established within all of the services, under which the commanding officer shall retain the right to review the case only for the purposes of exercising clemency. This, of course, parallels our civilian procedures under which the right of clemency is exercised by the President in Federal offenses, and by the governor in State offenses. The initial review of the case as to legality and as to all aspects other than clemency should vest in the theater area or fleet representative of the Judge Advocate General. Thereafter, further review should be had by a board of review established in the office of the Judge Advocate General and appointed by him, as provided in the Elston bill.

Under present practice, in none of the services do the accused or his counsel participate as a matter of right in review of courts-martial decisions. They rarely file briefs, and rarely do they have an opportunity to argue their case on review. They have no knowledge of the questions that are being raised and discussed by the reviewing officers, and have no opportunity of presenting their point of view.

We recommend that the record of proceedings in any court martial shall include, when forwarded for review, a summary of all objections prepared by defense counsel, and that defense counsel be permitted to submit briefs or other argument to the reviewing authority. If the accused desires, at his own expense, to present oral argument through civilian counsel to the reviewing authority, he should be permitted to do so.

The goal of a uniform code uniformly applied and interpreted in all of the services is obviously difficult of achievement without some top level coordinating agency. Ideally, when real unification of the military services is finally accomplished, there should be a single Judge Advocate General performing all legal duties for the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. Unification as provided in the National Defense Act falls far short of the unification under which such ideal can be realized. We must gear our recommendations accordingly to the existing situation, and to the advances that are realistically possible.

Accordingly, we recommend that there be established a board of review in the office of the Secretary of Defense, which shall have final power of review in all court-martial cases in all the services, and which will be charged with the development of uniform practices and procedures, much as the Supreme Court of the United States controls the decisions of the Federal courts of appeals. The Secretary of Defense should have the further duty of closely supervising the operations of the various Judge Advocate General Departments, and should have the power of recommending legislation to the Congress and of issuing directives to the services in matters pertaining to military and naval justice. He should have the specific responsibility of advancing unification of the legal functions of the armed services.

Today our country has for the first time a peacetime draft. Large numbers of our young men will in the years ahead serve in a peacetime Army, Navy and Air Force whose mission is the preservation of our American democracy. Under such circumstances it seems to us that there is a paramount obligation to those young men, to their anxious families, and to the basic principles of that American democracy to make full provision for the protection of those young men and to insure that their right to fair trials before qualified and independent courts is not impaired. We have every confidence that the adoption of the proposals made by us will strengthen the morale and discipline of our armed services, in time of war as well as in peacetime.

Respectfully submitted.

The bill now before you represents a long step forward in court-martial reform. That the representatives of the three services have been able to agree on a uniform code of procedure, on uniform terminology, and uniform substantive laws is an accomplishment which few thought could be brought about.

No one should underestimate the difficulties of that task, and the patient effort required to bring it about. It invites the hope that some day the ultimate objective of a single Judge Advocate General's Office, servicing all of the armed forces out of the office of the Secretary of Defense, will be realized.

We like many things about this bill. Our criticisms are not directed so much at what it does, as at what it does not do. Frankly, we are going to play Oliver Twist and ask for "more."

When Professor Morgan invited our views as to what ought to be in the model courts-martial bill which was being drafted, we told him that the basic reform without which there would be no such thing as real courts-martial reform, or in fact real courts martial, was the elimination of the domination and control of courts martial by command.

The phrase "command control" is vague and indefinite to those not close to the picture. Let me explain what we mean by it. Under the existing system the same commanding officer is empowered to accuse the defendant, to draft and direct the charges against him, to select the prosecutor and defense counsel from officers under his command, to choose the members of the court from his command, to review and alter the court's decision, and to change any sentence imposed.

Although the military and naval courts take oaths "to well and truly try, without prejudice or partiality, the case now depending, according to the evidence which shall be adduced, the laws for the government of the Navy, and your own conscience" those courts have too often been told by the commanding officer who appointed them that when he ordered a court, it meant that he had concluded the man was guilty, but that he could not impose a sufficient punishment himself.

Too often the courts have been told that they were expected to bring in verdicts of guilty, and impose specific sentences—and told that even before they had heard the testimony of the witnesses.

That is command control. And the control is exercised by reason of the fact that the participants in the courts—the judges, the prosecutors, and the defense counsel—are subject to the full command of the officers who appointed them, and that their service careers are in his hands.

If you will read the press release issued by Secretary Forrestal's office when this bill was introduced, you will see the statement there that under this bill all of these powers which add up to command control are retained. The commanding officer still appoints the Officers under his command to serve as judges and as prosecutors.

He still reviews their decisions, and he has complete power to influence their decisions by the fact that he controls their promotions, assignments, leaves, and fitness reports. There is no question that this bill retains command control in all of its ugly aspects.

We are not alone in urging the elimination of command control and the creation of truly independent courts within the services. Every board and committee appointed by the War and Navy Departments has made this same recommendation, including the famous committee headed by Chief Justice Arthur T. Vanderbilt, of New Jersey.

The American Bar Association has made it. Veterans groups have made it. The recommendation comes from all of those concerned with our democratic way of life, who feel that it is not too much to ask that the citizen army of a democracy be given that fundamental fair play and assurance of justice which our country is trying to give to the rest of the world.

It is ironic that those who are being subjected to a peacetime draft for the first time in American history themselves are not given the basic rights which our Government seeks to give the rest of the world through their service.

I should like to emphasize that we are as much concerned about the maintenance of discipline in the armed forces as are those who seek to retain command control.

We believe that discipline is dependent in a large degree upon the morale of the men who make up the services, and we do not believe that there can be good morale when men feel that the service courts which are set up to do them justice are not real and fair courts as we think of them here in America.

There is little difference between an Army court which has been influenced by its commanding officer and the Budapest tribunal which recently convicted Cardinal Mindszenty.

We feel that the commanding officer must and should be able to place a man on trial and control and direct the prosecution. But the judicial machinery itself must be in the hands of an independent judicial system within the services which, not subject to pressure and influence from command, will insure the accused the same fair trial by competent personnel that he would receive in our criminal courts were he a civilian.

This can be accomplished by including in this bill the recommendations of the Vanderbilt Committee for the creation of independent Judge Advocate General's Departments within the services which will operate the courts of the services.

It is interesting to note that Great Britain, from which our own systems of military and naval justice derive, has itself effected this reform, and that in England today the Judge Advocate General is now appointed by the Lord Chancelor, who is England's chief judge.

It ought to be noted that this reform in Great Britain was not the work of a Socialist government, but was the recommendation of the Lewis Committee, composed of leading judges and generals.

If the power of appointing the court and defense counsel is to rest with the Judge Advocate General's Department, as we propose, and if the judicial review of courts martial is to be in the higher echelons of the Judge Advocate General's Department, this presupposes that there will be in each Department an independent Judge Advocate General's corps free of the control of command in matters of promotion, assignment, leaves, fitness reports, etc.

Such a professional corps already exists in the Army. It never has existed in the Navy, where line officers have been assigned legal duties. The Air Force has sponsored a bill already introduced which would exempt it from the necessity of having such a corps.

Establishment of such corps is not the departure from precedent that we are led to believe. It would be no different than the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Chaplain Corps, and the Engineers Corps which have existed for many years and without criticism.

We believe that matters affecting the lives and liberties of millions of men are sufficiently important to require the services of specialist officers. Failure to create such corps in the Navy and Air Force will itself frustrate the purposes of the bill before you, since this uniform code cannot receive uniform application when it is administered by trained specialists in the Army, and by nonspecialist officers in the Navy and the Air Force.

I should now like to address myself to specific provisions of the bill before you.

One of the admirable provisions of the bill is article 67, which creates a Judicial Council whose members shall be appointed by the President from civilian life and who shall receive the same salary as judges of the United States Court of Appeals.

Such Judicial Council is to be the final reviewing authority of courts martial. The provision for such a Judicial Council is a forward-looking step, and will do much to remove the confusion that now surrounds reviews.

However, the language of the section is in itself confusing. It does not specify how many members of the Council there shall be. It does not indicate whether they shall be appointed by the President alone, or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It does not say whether they shall serve for life, for a tenure of years, or at the pleasure of the President.

We believe that if the members of the Judicial Council are to have the pay and status of the judges of the court of appeals, they should be appointed in the same manner and under the same conditions as such judges.

We recommend that a specific number of members of the Judicial Council shall be provided for, and that they shall be appointed with Senate confirmation for life and good behavior.

Also with reference to the review provisions of the bill, article 66 (c) provides that within 10 days after any decision by a board of review, the Judge Advocate General may refer the case for reconsideration to the same or another board of review.

We believe that this provision destroys the independence and integrity of boards of review, and that it should be stricken. There is ample provison for review by the Judicial Council of the board of review's decision.

Article 2 (11) of the bill has by its language what I am sure must be an unintentional impact upon the civil liberties of the civil populations of Guam, American Samoa, and the trust territory of the Pacific.

At the present time the civil populations of those American Territories are under the supervision of the Navy Department. On June 19, 1947, the President sent a special message to the Congress—Eightieth Congress, first session, Document No. 333—in which he advised the Congress that the State, War, Navy, and Interior Departments had jointly recommended the enactment of legislation to grant citizenship, a bill of rights, and civil government to the people of Guam and American Samoa. In that message the President requested the enactment of such legislation.

While such legislation has not yet been enacted, it is inconceivable that the same Departments which made that recommendation should now recommend contrary legislation which, instead of making the peoples of our American colonies the possessors of the basic civil rights, would subject them to trial by Army and Navy courts martial.

The language of article 2 (11) should be revised so as to except from the persons subject to the jurisdiction of courts martial the civil populations of Guam, American Samoa, and the trust territory.

Article 55 of the bill prohibits the imposition of any cruel and unusual punishments. We feel that the spirit of this section is violated by article 15 (a) (2) (f) which permits the commanding officer himself to impose upon an enlisted person in any of the armed services confinement on bread and water for 5 days.

At the present time such punishment cannot be inflicted by any civil court, or, indeed, by any court in the Army or Air Force. It may only be imposed by a naval officer. It is our considered judgment that the extension of bread and water punishment to all the services open the doors wide to future Litchfields.

Such punishment to our minds seems cruel and barbaric, and to fit in the same category as the floggings, brandings, and tattooings which are specifically prohibited by article 55. Such punishments, when imposed by the Japanese and the Germans in World War II met with the highest condemnation of the American people.

They will meet with the same condemnation when imposed by American officers on American men. We understand that the retention of such punishment has been requested by the Navy Department on the ground that merely confining a man at sea is no punishment, since it operates merely to free him from the performance of his duties.

Other punishments are available, however. At the very least, this section should be limited so that a man may be confined on bread and water only while he is at sea.

Article 28 provides that a reporter at a court martial shall make a record of the proceedings of the testimony before the court. Under present procedure, the reporter does not make a record of the opening and closing arguments of counsel. We feel that such arguments should be recorded, and that the bill should so provide.

This is important since, in the review of courts martial, trial counsel are not normally afforded an opportunity to present their views to the reviewing authority. Only by a reading of their arguments can their views and theories be made known.

Mr. ELSTON. Can I interpose right there? You do not make the opening statements of counsel in a civil case a matter of record?

Mr. WELS. No, Mr. Elston. But in civil cases, where the case goes up on appeal, counsel is present to present his case and his theory to the court, whereas in your courts martial the record comes to the reviewing authority without having briefs of counsel.

This is intended to be the vehicle through which counsel presents his theories as he would normally on personal experience and by brief in the civil court.

Mr. ELSTON. Briefs are provided for in this bill and counsel is afforded the accused at any time either in trial before the courts martial or on appeal. So the situation in that respect is the same as in civil courts.

Mr. WELS. Yes; but counsel on an appeal may very well be assigned from the Department, maybe from within the Judge Advocate General's Office, and this is intended to give him the benefit of the theory and the argument the trial counsel had since he frequently may not be the same person.

Article 37 prohibits commanding officers from attempting to influence courts martial. This provision flows from Article of War 88, as embodied in the Elston bill. The latitude which is directly given to command to interfere in the business of courts martial even under this provision is demonstrated by article 87 of the new Army Court-Martial Manual, which provides that:

> A commanding officer may, through his staff judge advocate or otherwise, give general instruction to a court martial which he has appointed, preferably before any cases have been referred to it for trial. Such instruction may relate to the rules of evidence, burden of proof, and presumption of innocence, and may include information as to the state of discipline in the command, as to the prevalence of offenses which have impaired efficiency and discipline, and of command measures which have been taken to prevent offenses. Such instructions may also present the views of the Department of the Army as to what are regarded as appropriate sentences for designated classes of offenses. The commander may not, however, directly or indirectly give instruction to or otherwise unlawfully influence a court as to its future action in a particular case.

It is our view that this article, although we support its purpose, is ineffective to accomplish that purpose. We believe that the inherent powers of commanding officers are such that, if they desire to manifest their displeasure at the manner in which members of a court appointed by them have handled a case, they can readily do so through the exercise of administrative discretion without furnishing any overt proof of a violation of article 37 by them. This article is ineffective in the case of a commanding officer who desires to influence or dominate a court.

Article 54(c) should specifically provide that, in addition to a copy of the record of the proceedings, the accused shall be furnished with copies of all documentary exhibits.

Article 88 provides that any officer who uses disrespectful language concerning the President, Vice President, Members of Congress and of the Cabinet, Governor, and members of State and territorial legislatures shall be subject to court-martial action.

In view of the recent case of Captain Dierdorfer on the West Coast, and general public reaction to the punishment awarded that officer, it is our view that careful consideration should be given this section, and that it should be safeguarded against the political martyrdom of service personnel.

Articles 118 and 120 make drastic revision in certain present practices. At the present time military personnel who are charged with murder and rape committed in the continental United States during peacetime are tried by civilian courts. These new articles would make such offenses punishable by general court martial.

Such offenses are serious crimes. Their prosecution and punishment in peacetime should not be taken away from the civilian authorities and entrusted to the services until adequate specialist corps have been established in all of the services which can assure that they will receive adequate, competent disposition.

I should like to conclude with a few remarks about special courts martial, the three-man courts provided for in article 16. These correspond to the present summary courts martial in the Navy, and special courts martial in the Army.

It has been my experience—and that of most other Reserve officers—that the principal abuses in courts martial occurred in such courts, which were invariably appointed by the commanding officer of the ship or unit in which the offense occurred. Such officers, who had close connection with the personalities and problems involved, have a greater concern with the outcome of a case than does the officer with general court martial authority, who is usually on a higher echelon. The bulk of the cases in which command exercised its influence over the courts occurred in such cases.

Such special courts have far-reaching powers. They are, for instance, authorized by article 19 of the present bill to award bad-conduct discharges. All of you are familiar with the fact that a bad-conduct discharge can cripple a man's life, and do him irreparable damage.

This was pointed out by Congressman Doyle a few moments ago.

Yet a great many of the safeguards which this bill throws around general courts-martial are not available in special courts. Thus, law officers are not required on special courts, and both the prosecutor and defense counsel may be persons without legal training.

I can envisage situations where it is not practicable to furnish such safeguards in special courts, but I think that in the great majority of cases they can be made available. Certainly if they are not, the special court should not be able to award a bad-conduct discharge.

We recommend that your committee revise the language of the bill so as to require the furnishing of all safeguards in special courts wherever practicable, and to require a certificate from the commanding officer setting forth the reasons why it was not practicable to furnish them in such cases where they were not.

In conclusion, I should like to state that the bill before you, while not the ideal measure for which we have striven, is a large improvement upon the existing system. Amendments of the character which have been suggested will make it a good bill, and will give to our citizen Army, Navy, and Air Force, and their families, the assurance that they are receiving the full benefits of that American way of life for which they are willingly risking their lives.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you very much, Mr. Wells.

Mr. BROOKS. Are there any questions to be asked of the witness?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to ask Lieutenant Wels—glad to see you again—a question about this bread-and-water provision.

Mr. WELS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. On page 4 you say: "Other punishments are available, however," but you fail to specify what they are.

Mr. WELS. The bill specifically provides other punishments that may be imposed by the commanding officers at mast or at company punishment. It permits him to confine them without bread and water—just ordinary imprisonment.

Mr. ANDERSON. You mean starve them?

Mr. WELS. No, to confine him on full rations. I am just looking for that section number.

Mr. SMART. Article 15 is the article to which you are referring.

Mr. ANDERSON. If what you had in mind there is in the bill, all right. I just wanted to know what you had in mind by your statement——

Mr. WELS. What I had in mind is provided for in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thought you said: "At the very least, this section should be limited so that a man may be confined on bread and water only while he is at sea."

Mr. WELS. Yes. I think that would be a fair amendment, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. One other thing here. In referring to article 88, which provides that any officer who uses disrespectful language, and so forth—do you think that ought to be reversed?

Mr. WELS. No.

Mr. ANDERSON. I mean, if the President uses disrespectful language?

Mr. BROOKS. Well——

Mr. ANDERSON. We will take that off the record.

Mr. BROOKS. Any further questions?

We thank you very much——

Mr. RIVERS. It so happens that the President was right when he made that statement.

Mr. WELS. I do not think he was talking about anybody in the service.

Mr. BROOKS. We will not go into that at all.

The next witness is Mr. Arthur Farmer, chairman of the committee on military law of the War Veterans Bar Association.

Mr. Farmer.

STATEMENT BY ARTHUR E. FARMER, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON MILITARY LAW OF THE WAR VETERANS BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. FARMER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am frankly not going to cover everything or nearly everything I have in my statement.

(The prepared statement follows:)

PREPARED STATEMENT OF ARTHUR E. FARMER, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON MILITARY LAW OF THE WAR VETERANS BAR ASSOCIATION, FOR PRESENTATION TO SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1, HOUSE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Consideration of H. R. 2498 compels the conclusion that this uniform code of military justice is an outstanding work of codification, simplification and correction of the Articles of War and the articles for the Government of the Navy. Many loopholes that were left in the army court-martial system by the provisions of the Elston Act have been closed in the code, and the establishment of a single system of courts-martial for all the services fills a long-felt want. The modification of the duties of the present law member of a general court-martial, so as to make him in effect the judge and the other members of the court the jury for the purpose of arriving at findings with respect to the charges and specifications, is greatly to be commended.

The revised provisions for review of records of trial set forth in part IX of the uniform code are especially salutary (with a single exception that will be noted later in this statement) in two respects: (a) they greatly simplify the provisions of A. W. 50½; and (b) the creation of a judicial council consisting of properly qualified laymen who will have the status of judges of the United States courts of appeal, is a tremendous advancement not only in the proper functioning of the court-martial system, but also toward the gaining of military and public confidence in the workings of the services' courts.

It would be possible to commend the uniform code in many other respects and the greatest credit is due to its framers for their work of codification. The difficulty, however, is that the basic reform which the court-martial system requires and without which no real reform is possible—the elimination of command control from the courts—is conspicuously missing. Under the uniform code the commanding general will still appoint the members of the court, the trial counsel and the defense counsel from members of his command, and will review the findings and sentence. We will still have the same old story of a court and counsel, all of whom are dependent upon the appointing and reviewing authority for their efficiency ratings, their promotions, their duties, and their leaves.

The provisions of article 37 which prohibit the censure of the court and counsel and any attempt to coerce the court's actions, will be valueless in a situation where the commanding general desires to circumvent them. It is naive to suppose that it will be necessary for the commanding general to use such direct means of influencing the court that they could form the basis for prosecution under article 37. And no one who served in any branch of the armed forces would underestimate the difficulty of obtaining an accuser of the commanding general, or a trial of the charges if an accuser could be found. The only method of making effective the prohibitions of article 37 is to remove from command the power to influence the court.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that practically every committee which has studied the subject has made the removal of command control the sine qua non of effective court-martial control. The War Department Advisory Committee on Military Justice made the checking of command control its primary recommendation. Its conclusion, after having heard the Secretary of War, the Army's Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and scores of other high officials and ranking officers, after having taken testimony in regional public hearings in 10 of the largest cities in the United States, and after having digested the contents of hundreds of letters and answers to its mimeographed questionnaires, was as follows (report, pp. 6–7):

"The committee is convinced that in many instances the commanding officer who selected the members of the courts made a deliberate attempt to influence their decisions. It is not suggested that all commanders adopted this practice but its prevalence was not denied and indeed in some instances was freely admitted. The close association between the commanding general, the staff judge advocate, and the officers of his division made it easy for the members of the court to acquaint themselves with the views of the commanding officer. Ordinarily in the last war a general court was appointed by the major general of a division from the officers in his command, and in due course their judgment was reviewed by him. Not infrequently the members of the court were given to understand that in case of a conviction they should impose the maximum sentence provided in the statute so that the general, who had no power to increase a sentence, might fix it to suit his own ideas. * * *

"Indeed, the general attitude is expressed by the maxim that discipline is a function of command. Undoubtedly there was in many instances an honest conviction that since the appointing authority was responsible for the welfare and lives of his men, he also had the power to punish them and consequently the courts appointed by him should carry out his will. We think that this attitude is completely wrong and subversive of morale; and that it is necessary to take definite steps to guard against the break-down of the system at this point by making such action contrary to the Articles of War or regulations and by protecting the courts from the influence of the officers who authorize and conduct the prosecution."

In a poll conducted by the Judge Advocate's Association, a national organization comprising in its membership nearly 2,200 of some 2,700 lawyers who served as officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department during War II, 703 out of 774 members, replying to a questionnaire, advocated the total separation of the appointing and reviewing authority from command, with the power of the commanding officer limited to appointing the trial judge advocate and to referring the charges for trial. The resolutions of the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association, condemning the provisions of the Articles of War which effectuate command control and which are carried forward into the Uniform Code, are too familiar to the members of this committee to require quotation, nor is the fact that practically every other bar association and veterans' organization, as well as the Navy's own Keeffe Board, has taken a strong position against the perpetuation of such powers in the commanding officer, new to the members of this committee.

It would seem proper, however, to refer to two cases in the Federal courts which were referred to in an article written by George A. Spiegelberg, Esq., chairman of the special committee on military justice of the American Bar Association, in the January 1949 issue of that association's journal. The first is Shapiro v. United States (69 F. Supp. 205), and the second is Beets v. Hunter (75 F. Supp. 825). Without going into the facts which brought forth these acid comments made by Federal judges—and which certainly merited the comments—the following is taken from the court's opinion in the Shapiro case:

"A more flagrant case of military despotism would be hard to imagine. It was the verdict of a supposedly impartial judicial tribunal; but it was evidently rendered in spite against a junior officer who had dared to demonstrate the fallibility of the judgment of his superior officers on the court—who had, indeed, made them look ridiculous. It was a case of almost complete denial of plaintiff's constitutional rights. It brings great discredit upon the administration of military justice."

Digitized by Google

And in Beets v. Hunter, Circuit Judge Murrah said:

"The trial of this case in the eyes of both the prosecution and the defense was wholly obnoxious and repulsive to their fundamental sense of justice, and that is the test by which this court should judge it.

"The court has no difficulty in finding that the court which tried this man was saturated with tyranny; the compliance with the Articles of War and with military justice was an empty and farcical compliance only, and the court so finds from the facts and so holds as a matter of law.

"He (the accused) could not have received due process of law in a trial in a court before men whose judgments did not belong to them, who had not the will nor the power to pass freely upon the guilt or innocense of this petitioner's offense, the offense for which he was charged."

No system which permits the possibility of trials which deservedly bring forth such judicial criticism can properly be termed a system of justice—military or otherwise.

The remedy is simple and was first succinctly stated by Secretary Patterson's War Department advisory committee on military justice. That it bore in mind the necessity of preserving the disciplinary authority of command is explicit in its statement. The committee said (report, p. 9):

"The need to preserve the disciplinary authority of the command and at the same time to protect the independence of the court can be met in the following manner: The authority of the division or post commander to refer a charge for prompt trial to a court appointed by a judge advocate should be absolute. The commander should, of course, be furnished with a judge advocate to advise him with reference to the disposition of the charge. The right of the command to control the prosecution, and to name the trial judge advocate, who should be a trained lawyer, should be retained. The Judge Advocate General's Department, however, should become the appointing and reviewing authority independent of the command. For this purpose the present organization of the Judge Advocate General's Department may be sufficient and the power to select and review its judgment should normally rest with the staff judge advocate at Army level, so that the members of the court may be selected from a wider area and the perennial problem of disparity of sentences in similar cases may be at least partially solved. It may be best in certain instances to place the authority on a higher level, or in case of war or in case of units established at a distance from the command, to delegate the authority to a division or smaller unit. We believe that the flexibility of such a system will aid in the solving of many problems and will permit the establishment of permanent courts or traveling courts if they be found desirable."

The changes recommended are neither drastic administratively nor difficult of accomplishment practically, however, revolutionary they may be in concept in the armed forces of the United States. They require only the substitution of the senior member of the Judge Advocate General's Department or senior legal specialist attached to a command, for the commanding officer as the convening authority. Each commanding general of a division or other proper unit will designate a panel of officers for court-martial duty. In the ordinary courts, the convening authority would appoint the court from the panel submitted by the commanding general of the division of which the accused is a member. But when that commanding general has shown any tendency to attempt to influence the members of the panel—even though it would be impossible to obtain a conviction under article 37, or if it were inexpedient to transfer or try the commaidnng general because of his military value—then the accused from that division would be tried by members of a panel from another division.

It is obvious that the problem would be more difficult in the naval forces, but the custom in the Navy has been for the Secretary of the Navy and the naval Judge Advocate General to retain largely the power to appoint its general courts martial, and it has not been customary for the commanding officers of units of the fleet to appoint such courts. In the normal case, therefore, it is apparent that it would be quite practicable for the senior legal specialist attached to the staff of the commander in chief of a fleet, or the commanding officer of a naval station or larger shore activity of the Navy beyond the continental limits of the United States (Uniform Code, art. 22) to convene a court with no greater difficulty than the commander in chief of the fleet or the commanding officer of the naval station would have experienced in so doing. The provisions of subdivisions (6) and (7) of article 22 giving convening authority to other commanding officers on lower levels may be continued by substituting for these commanding officers the senior member of the Judge Advocate General's Corps or the senior legal specialist attached to their staff.

It is quite possible that a situation may arise in the Navy where no legal specialist will be available. In such instances, a legal specialist could be temporarily attached to the staff of the command. A court which has the power to impose a sentence of death, of life imprisonment, or of bad-conduct or dishonorable discharge (which carry with them permanent disgrace and impairment of earning power in civilian life), should not be so appointed as to permit of any possible reflection upon its impartiality and independence merely because it would be inconvenient to attach, temporarily, a legal specialist to a lower echelon of one of the services.

The senior member of the Judge Advocate General's Corps, or the senior legal specialist, having been designated as the convening authority, the same powers of review should be exercised by them as are exercised by the commanding officer as convening authority under the proposed uniform code. Before the record is forwarded to the convening authority for review, however, it should be passed upon by the commanding officer who in the uniform code is designated as convening authority, for the exercise of clemency. His endorsement would limit the power of the reviewing authorities with respect to approval of the sentence.

In addition to this primary revision in the method of appointing general courts and accomplishing the initial review of their findings and sentence, certain other important changes should be made in the uniform code. These will be discussed in the order of their appearance in the articles of the code.

1. Article 8 authorizes civil officers summarily to apprehend "a deserter from the armed forces of the United States." This article should be amended so as to authorize such officers to apprehend "a deserter or a person absent without leave from the armed forces of the United States." The heading of the article should be amended in like manner to read: "Apprehension of Deserters and Personnel Absent Without Leave".

2. Article 15 is concerned with the right of a commanding officer to impose nonjudicial punishment. In the Army an accused has the right, under the provisions of the Manual for Court Martial, to refuse such punishment and demand trail by a court cartial. In the Navy this is not true. When it is realized that a commanding officer may, under subdivision (a) (1) (C) impose upon an officer forfeiture of one-half pay per month for a period up to 3 months, and may in like manner reduce an enlisted man in grade or order him confined on bread and water for 5 days, the injustice of such a provision is apparent. Whether or not the imposition of punishment of such severity, without a right to trial, has been sanctified by custom in one branch of the service, it is still unjustifiable, and the fact that no such power is given to commanding officers in another branch of the service and discipline has been maintained despite the lack of such power, shows conclusively that the power is not necessary to the maintenance of discipline.

In any event, confinement on bread and water is a barbarous relic of earlier days and should be abolished, and if the commanding officer is to have power to impose nonjudicial punishment without affording his personnel an opportunity to demand trial by court martial, then he should not be permitted to impose forfeiture of one-half pay per month for more than 1 month, nor to reduce an enlisted man in grade. It is hereby earnestly recommended, however, that the nonjudicial punishments, with the exception of confinement on bread and water, be maintained as provided by the bill, but that the right to demand trial by court martial be written in.

Further, trial by court martial should be trial by a special or general court and not by the commanding officer's alter ego, the summary court officer. In order to effect the latter change, article 20 must be amended, as hereinafter set forth.

3. Article 19: Under the provisions of this article special courts martial may judge a bad-conduct discharge even though not a single member of the court or of counsel is trained in the law. It is certain that a bad-conduct discharge will be a stain on a man's record throughout life and will seriously affect both his opportunities to obtain employment and his chances for advancement. Such a stigma and the imposition of such a handicap should not be imposed unless a law officer shall sit as a member of the court to guide it in its reception of evidence and in the application of the relevant law. It is therefore strongly urged that article 19 be amended by adding the following language to the final sentence of article 19:

Digitized by Google

"and unless a law officer, qualified as set forth in article 26 (a) hereof, shall be appointed to the court and shall be present throughout the trial."

4. Article 20: This article should be amended by adding to the first sentence the following words:

"nor shall he be brought to trial before a summary court martial in any event, unless he shall consent to trial by such court."

5. Article 32: Subdivision (b) of this article enumerates the matters of which the accused shall be advised in connection with the investigation of the charges preferred. It should be amended to include a provision that he must be advised of his right to be represented by counsel. To assume that the accused will be aware of this right without being specifically informed of it, would be most unrealistic and if the accused is to have the right to be represented by counsel, it should be made realistic by the change indicated. This change may be accomplished by rewording the first line of subdivision (b) as follows:

"The accused shall be advised of the charges against him and of his right to be represented by counsel * * *"

6. Article 52: Subdivision (c) of this article requires an amendment to eliminate a material source of confusion. This subdivision provides, among other things, as follows:

"A tie vote * * * on a question of the accused's sanity shall be a determination against the accused."

This section should be amended by stating specifically that the loss of a motion for a finding of not guilty based upon the accused's lack of sanity, shall not preclude a finding of not guilty because of the accused's lack of sanity, and that an accused may not be convicted where his sanity is in issue, except upon the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the court present at the time the vote was taken as to the sanity of the accused.

7. Article 66: The framers of the uniform code have done an especially fine piece of work with respect to the system of review. Nevertheless, a most undesirable provision is embodied in subdivision (e) of article 66. This subdivision provides that within 10 days after any decision of a board of review, the Judge Advocate General may refer the case for reconsideration to the same or another board of review.

The decision of a board of review should be final and no more excuse exists for referring the same case to another board of review than for bringing before the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit a case which has already been decided by the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit. Under the provisions of subdivision (b) (1) of article 67, the Judicial Council is required to review the record in all cases reviewed by a board of review which the Judge Advocate General orders forwarded to the Judicial Council for review. That provision gives to the Judge Advocate General the right to cause a review of a decision of a board of review in which he does not concur. Having the right to submit such a case to the Judicial Council, no reason exists why he should be able to peddle the case among other boards of review until he obtains the decision which he desires.

8. Article 67: Subdivision (c) of this article provides that the Judicial Council shall act upon a petition for review within 15 days of the receipt thereof. It seems likely that this period may be insufficient in many instances, and it is therefore suggested that the period should be enlarged to 30 days.

9. Article 69: In the interests of clarity, the first part of the second sentence of this article should be reworded as follows: "If any part of the findings or sentence is found incorrect in law or in fact * * *."

It is difficult to believe that in the case of a review by an officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General, the reviewing officer shall not have the power to weigh the evidence in like manner as the board of review and Judicial Council are now empowered. This should be made clear by the rewording indicated.

10. Article 70: In order to make subdivision (c) (3) of this article conform to the proposed amendment to subdivision (3) of article 66, it should be reworded as follows: "when the Judge Advocate General has transmitted a case to the Judicial Council."

While the uniform code will not accomplish the desired result of achieving a real system of justice in the courts of the armed services unless command control is eliminated in the manner indicated in this statement, it cannot be too strongly emphasized that the revisions of the present Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy embodied in the code are essential parts of such a system. Each of them must be maintained, subject to the changes above set forth, in addition to the removal of command control, if real reform is to be accomplished.

Digitized by Google

You will find, beginning on the bottom of page 7, a series of specific recommendations with respect to amendments of the articles. I do not think I should take the time to go into them. They are available for you. If I touch on them, it will not be in full.

I would like to first state what my experience has been, so you can judge for yourself as to the value of it. I served as an enlisted man in the Army, both in this country and in New Guinea, for 2 years.

I was returned to this country and went to Judge Advocate General's School. I was commissioned in the Judge Advocate General's School.

Mr. NORBLAD. At Ann Arbor?

Mr. FARMER. Yes, and served for a year as an assistant judge advocate in various camps throughout the South. Since the time I was separated from the service there has been no period in which I have not been at work on this particular question of court-martial reform.

Now I would like to say that my position is that this is a practical question. This is not a question merely of legality and of lawyers. The first thing an army has to do, I agree, or a navy, is to win a war and everything must be bent to that end.

So the question comes up: Are any reforms which are being advocated here likely to interfere with the prosecution of the war or the maintenance of discipline? If they are, they have to go.

Now, this code as a code, as far as it goes, is a perfectly splendid piece of work. It does safeguard the rights of the accused insofar as he will have adequate counsel. It does safeguard his rights insofar as he has a real, honest-to-goodness law officer who performs the functions of judge. It has a splendid system of review. And it has many other provisions which I am certainly in accord with.

It does not, however, as the other two gentlemen who preceded me said, remove the influence of command over the courts.

Now, if the influence of command over the courts is necessary for the maintenance of discipline and the winning of wars, then let us have it.

But I have yet to be given any facts which indicate that that is true. As a matter of fact, when the Vanderbilt committee which was appointed by Secretary of War Patterson had the question before him their conclusion was from the testimony which they got of commanding generals, the Secretary of War and various other officers including members of the Judge Advocate General's Department, that the true administration of justice was an aid to the winning of wars because with a failure of honest justice you had a falling off in morale.

There is always a question that I want to put to somebody who says, "We don't want to interfere with the courts, they must be independent." The officers of the court make the statement that they will render justice according to the dictates of their conscience and yet who say nevertheless command must keep control over these courts.

And the question is: For what purpose? "If you don't want to influence them, why should you insist on keeping that command influence?"

Now, what is the situation? Of course you have the same old story that was mentioned by Senator Norris when the Chamberlain bill was before the subcommittee in 1919. You have the commanding general who is in effect if not in law the prosecutor appointing the court, ordering the case to trial, appointing defense counsel, appointing the trial judge advocate—the prosecuting authority—and when they get all through with it, then initially reviewing the record.

Now, that is an intolerable situation because as a practical matter—no matter how many articles 37 you write forbidding coercion of the courts—so long as there are commanding generals who feel it is their duty to influence the courts because discipline requires it, they are going to find means to do so.

When I was down at Camp Gordon and it was done in one instance very beautifully by putting the officer under arrest by written order instead of the usual way which is by word of mouth.

The court could not have been more influenced if each and every officer was called before him and told, "Look, this man is guilty and make an example of him." In other instances, the way it is done very simply is that there is a heart-to-heart discussion between the general and his operations staff officer.

They discuss the seriousness of the offense, in the hearing of a couple of other officers, and the Army grapevine which functions so beautifully goes into action, and every member of the court knows about it.

In other instances what happens is that the general will call the president of the court in and he will say, "You have a series of very important cases and I want you to consider them most carefully because the entire discipline of the command depends on them."

Now, that could be taken to mean: I want them acquitted, but I do not think it would normally be because you do not call the president of the court for the purpose of saying you want him to be acquitted.

And yet, under article 37, you will not prove a blessed thing that anything improper had been done.

So the only way in which you can prevent command influence on the court is by taking it out of the power of the command to do it.

Now, this does not require any radical revision of the present system. It does require that having set up an independent Judge Advocate General's Department you put the power to appoint the courts and counsel and to conduct the initial review under that group.

Now, how can you do it? All that you have to do is to have the appointing authority and the senior judge advocate and the junior legal specialists attached to the next higher echelon than the one that is ordering the man to trial.

That does not mean that the commanding general or the commanding officer in the Navy loses the power to assign his officers. He will submit a panel of officers who are available for court-martial duty.

Today he simply designates those officers as a court. If the situation which I am making is carried forward, instead of designating that as the court, he will designate these officers as available for court duty.

Then the judge advocate at the next higher echelon will appoint from the panels that come to him from the various commands courts to sit and hear the case.

Now, that does not mean that if a man comes up for trial from the Twenty-second Division he necessarily must be tried by a court appointed from officers from the Fifth Division, or the One Hundredth Division. In the normal course, where your commanding officers keep their hands off the courts, there is no reason in the world why the accused cannot be tried by officers from his own command.

Digitized by Google

And I would expect that in the normal course the judge advocate at the higher level would appoint a court consisting of officers from that very division.

But there will come cases where feeling runs high in a command, where perhaps there has been some invisible exercise of authority which results in disobedience by an inferior—whether it is an officer or an enlisted man—and it becomes a cause célèbre in that division.

There the authority is being challenged and, by golly, it is going to be vindicated by a conviction whether the man is guilty or not. That is the type of case in which the judge advocate at the higher level should have the power to order trial before a court consisting of officers from some other command.

There may also be instances where it is found that the commanding general is consistently trying to influence his courts. In those cases men should be tried before courts appointed from panels of officers from other divisions or other headquarters.

It may be that you have any number of situations that might come up where the ordinary and expected even-handed dispensation of justice is followed up.

Now, all that this is intended to do is to take care of those situations which are not now being taken care of. You cannot say that we are going to discipline or reprimand or remove a commanding general because he interferes with the court. The purpose of the Army is to win the war.

If you have a good fighting commanding general of a division you are not going to discipline him or destroy his effectiveness by repremanding him because he sticks his fingers into his courts in good faith.

But you do have to do something so that the men in his command do get a fair trial. And the only way you are going to do it is by taking that power away from him. Let him continue as a fighting officer, but also let the officers and men in his division have a fair trial.

Mr. RIVERS. In that connection, do you think it will be easy to incorporate that philosophy or that recommendation in this particular piece of legislation?

Mr. FARMER. Yes; I think it would be very easy, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. Very easy to put it in here. I have not gone into it fully, but I have heard the objection that maybe subsequent legislation should follow this recommended or advocated objective.

Mr. FARMER. Well, sir, the point is this: Here you have under part V—appointment and composition of courts martial——

Mr. RIVERS. Therefore you contend it is not hard to put it in this particular piece of legislation?

Mr. FARMER. No; it is not difficult at all. It can be done very simply.

Mr. RIVERS. All right.

Mr. FARMER. Now the objection to that that comes up is: How about your isolated commands? Well, it was taken care of in the last war. In the north African theater they had many isolated commands and many times where they had a company or separate detachment over somewhere they simply did not try them by a courts martial appointed out of that little bit of a group.

What they did was to have traveling teams. They had a three-man team: Law member, trial judge advocate, and defense counsel. And the command was large enough so that you could expect unprejudiced officers.

Digitized by Google

They simply sent the team out, and the team tries those cases. Where the command was not large enough you took the accused, you took one of two witnesses—and unless it is a capital case you could take deposition—and you moved them, as was suggested here earlier, by plane to the nearest base and you tried them there.

And there was not any undue delay.

Mr. GAVIN. What were the results from those teams? What was the reaction from them? What kind of work did they do?

Mr. FARMER. Excellent work.

Mr. GAVIN. Excellent work. They were unprejudiced. They went in there and knew nothing except to take the case and handle them clearly, as they saw it.

Mr. FARMER. Yes; that is right. And the best testament to it was it was first started as an experiment and then it was continued and put into common usage. In fact, in this country, in the Sixth Service Command, sir, there was one group of general courts martial at headquarters of the Sixth Service Command.

And at every trial before a general courts martial the accused was brought from wherever he was in the Sixth Service Command to the headquarters to be tried by these independent courts, and they functioned beautifully.

Mr. RIVERS. Who was responsible for that directive creating these independent teams?

Mr. FARMER. That, sir, I cannot answer. But I think it was done in the first instance at the suggestion of the staff judge advocate attached to the north African theater.

Mr. RIVERS. The reason I ask: You recall last year we had opposition from the General Staff, whomever it was, opposing an independent Judge Advocate General. You remember that, sir?

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir. This I must say, Congressman Rivers, was not a question of an independent Judge Advocate General's Department.

Mr. RIVERS. But——

Mr. FARMER. The way it worked out, it was.

Mr. RIVERS. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. FARMER. And that is one of the better things about moving the power of appointment to the higher echelons. When you get to the higher echelons, you do not have the officers putting their fingers in the court. You do have some independents.

But here, where you had testimony opposing it, I think you had your witnesses speak of those who functioned at the higher echelons and not people I have worked with as an enlisted man, working with a trial judge advocate that was not a lawyer, but who was trying cases when men were on trial for their lives and for manslaughter and for disobedience to orders.

It would mean working right down the division, or some place like Finchhaven where I was, to see how those things worked out.

Mr. BROOKS. You referred to a case where the members moved to the Sixth Service Command Headquarters.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. And the cases were tried there.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. What do you do about the witnesses?

Digitized by Google

Mr. FARMER. In most cases, sir, in which an Army offense is involved there are two witnesses—at the most three witnesses.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, you have lots of crimes against the civilian population, where civilian witnesses are necessary.

Mr. FARMER. Where you have civilian witnesses, sir, it was necessary to have them travel from their homes to the place where the trial was being held. Time and time again, at Camp Gordon, we had to bring in civilian witnesses from Kentucky and other parts of Georgia because we had cases there of a statutory rape or an assault case which occurred when the man was AWOL.

Mr. GAVIN. Wherever the witnesses were, they could be brought back anyway.

Mr. FARMER. Certainly.

Mr. GAVIN. Without any difficulty.

Mr. BROOKS. You think that is better than bringing the court to the witnesses?

Mr. FARMER. I do not think, frankly, that makes much difference, whether you bring the court to the witnesses or the witnesses to the court. You still have to have some traveling involved and it is no harder one way than the other.

What I am pointing out here, sir, is that the availability of witnesses does not make impracticable the setting up of the courts under the system which I am suggesting. That does not present a problem.

Mr. ELSTON. As I understand it, you are pretty much satisfied with the provisions of the bill that we passed last year setting up a Judge Advocate General's Corps, except that you possibly feel that even that bill gave too much command influence?

Mr. FARMER. That bill was an excellent bill, sir, but it did not remove the power of command to influence the courts.

Mr. ELSTON. That is what I said. Except for that——

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. The setting up of a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps as I understand your statement would meet most of your objections?

Mr. FARMER. It would not meet the objection to removal of command control because no matter how independent your Judge Advocate General's Department is, so long as command appoints the courts, the independence of the Judge Advocate General's Corps does not help them.

Mr. ELSTON. Well, with that exception.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. It would take care of the matter.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELSTON. That is the sum and substance of your whole statement.

Mr. FARMER. That is right, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. Let me get that, again. I want to be sure.

Mr. GAVIN. Me, too. I did not hear it.

Mr. RIVERS. As Mr. Elston said, if we were to provide that grant in this bill, that would meet a great deal of the objections which you now speak of as to the deficiencies of this bill?

Mr. FARMER. Congressman Rivers, you now have under the Elston Act an independent Judge Advocate General's Department. This bill does not touch on that. It does not either destroy it or do anything to it.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RIVERS. That is right.

Mr. FARMER. So we start with the assumption that we do have an independent Judge Advocate General's Corps.

Now the question is——

Mr. BROOKS. For the Army.

Mr. FARMER. For the Army?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

I am addressing myself to the problem of the Army because it is correlative in the Navy.

Mr. BROOKS. All right.

Mr. FARMER. And the Air Force.

And there—I do not know—I leave it with you gentlemen whether that should be separate legislation or whether it should not be. It may be you are putting too much in one bill, if you try to accomplish that in one bite at this time.

Mr. RIVERS. That is what I asked you a while ago, and you said it would be simpler to put it in here.

Mr. FARMER. It would be simple to put in the new method of appointing the courts under article 22 and the subsequent sections.

Mr. RIVERS. Yes.

Mr. FARMER. You already have in the Army your independent Judge Advocate General.

Mr. RIVERS. I know that.

Mr. FARMER. And there the independent Judge Advocate General's Department would appoint the courts. In the Navy you do not have that separate corps, but you do have legal specialists who are attached to the staffs of commanders at various levels.

Now it would aid, even though you did not have an independent corps in the Navy and in the Air Force, if you had the power of appointment coming from the echelon above the one where the man is being tried. You still need an independent corps.

Mr. RIVERS. I see.

Mr. FARMER. But what I am pointing out here is if you have your courts appointed from the higher echelon you go a long way to removing command control.

Mr. PHILBIN. Do you have language that you suggest might be incorporated in the bill?

Mr. FARMER. I have not actually drafted language, sir. I have outlined in my statement the method by which it would be done, however.

Mr. PHILBIN. And where would you put it in?

Mr. FARMER. You would put it in in rewriting Part V—Appointment and Composition of Courts Martial.

Now I will add this that, as a practical matter, I think you would have to limit that type of appointment for the most part to general courts martial. But it is the general court which has the power of life and death over your accused and which has the power to give a dishonorable discharge to prejudice his whole life—to send him away for 40 or 50 years, as many of the courts did. It is that court which particularly must be safeguarded.

Digitized by Google

Mr. GAVIN. Why limit it to that? Even it some simple cases there were some very severe sentences that were passed out.

Mr. FARMER. By the general courts?

Mr. GAVIN. Yes.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir; there is no question about it.

Mr. GAVIN. So why limit it to a general court?

Mr. FARMER. Well, your special court is a different proposition. The power of the special court to sentence is so limited that although I would like that to go to special court I realize the argument of the Army and the Navy that it is not always practicable to put the appointing authority in a higher echelon.

There, in your special courts, as you will see here, sir——

Mr. SMART. Article 21.

Mr. FARMER. In special courts: Adjudge any punishment except death, dishonorable discharge, dismissal, confinement in excess of 6 months, hard labor without confinement in excess of 3 months, and forefeiture of pay not exceeding two-thirds pay per month for 6 months.

So practically speaking, a special court cannot impose any confinement of more than 6 months.

And I do make a suggestion in my statement here that if the special court is to have the power to adjudge a bad-conduct-case charge, which certainly would prejudice any man in civilian life, that there the accused is entitled to the protection of a legal officer, that is a law officer, on that court. And only in such instances would it be necessary.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Farmer, Mr. Norblad would like to ask you some questions.

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Farmer, you were speaking of your experience in Judge Advocate General matters. I might say I defended in a number of courts martial during the war. I was judge advocate in a number of cases.

I was also a law member and a staff judge advocate in the Ninth Air Force. I also attended the same school at Ann Arbor that you did. I agree with you 100 percent in what you say.

I think your biggest abuse in the courts martial during the war was command influence. Now, in the Elston bill, under section 37, there was put in a prohibition against that.

Mr. FARMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORBLAD. As far as I can see, in the new Courts-Martial Manual that came out a couple of weeks ago, under article 87 I believe it is, the Army has just twisted it around to make a complete change from the intention of Congress. Do you agree with that?

Mr. FARMER. I agree perfectly with that.

What is more, under the Courts-Martial Manual, they completely emasculated article 11 which provided that if the trial counsel is a lawyer and qualified in the specific manner mentioned there, then the defense counsel must be.

Now, by putting in the manual, in paragraph 56, that that only applies to your defense counsel and not to the assistant defense counsel, they have completely vitiated that provision under the regulations they have promulgated which are supposed to implement the Elston Act.

85266—49—No. 37——7

Digitized by Google

You have a situation, if the manual is to be followed, by which your trial counsel would be a lawyer and qualified. But your defense counsel actually defends the case. The assistant defense counsel does and he does not have to be so qualified.

So when you go to trial what do you have? You have a completely qualified prosecutor and a completely unqualified defense counsel.

Mr. NORBLAD. What is the reference to that, again?

Mr. FARMER. Paragraph 56, Manual for Courts Martial, 1949.

Mr. RIVERS. Of course, that is not surprising because they fought that proposal which we finally incorporated with everything they had in the book, if you remember.

Mr. FARMER. I remember that. That is why this bill must have everything in it and not leave anything, like waiving trial in lieu of nonjudicial punishment, to the services for interpretation.

The bill must be complete in itself. Otherwise it will be interpreted into nothing necessary. Like "if available" used to be in the old bill, where you had to have a member of the Judge Advocate General's Department if available as a law member.

Then the question was, When was he available? Under a recent decision of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit "if available" meant if militarily available and not if physically available. So in one case, the Hodges case, which was tried in the second circuit, you had the trial counsel who was a Judge Advocate General officer and the defense counsel was a Judge Advocate General officer, but the law member who was required to be one if available was declared not available.

There was not any Judge Advocate General officer available. So they went to bat without a Judge Advocate General officer as a law member.

Mr. BROOKS. Any more questions, gentlemen?

If not, we certainly thank you, Mr. Farmer, for a very fine statement.

Mr. FARMER. I thank the committee for its courtesy.

Mr. BROOKS. We have two more witnesses, do we not?

Mr. SMART. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to announce for the benefit of the members of the committee, the remaining witnesses and the interested listeners here that the House will conduct no business today, so the committee is perfectly free to proceed with these remaining two witnesses, both of whom represent the American Legion.

Mr. ELSTON. There is a conference this afternoon, though.

Mr. BROOKS. There will be no business on the floor. However, some of the members have expressed themselves as interested in being present there due to the memorial service.

Mr. ELSTON. Are the witnesses from out of town?

Mr. SMART. Yes. We have one witness from Utah here.

Mr. TAYLOR. But if it pleases the committee, I will have the witnesses remain over and we can come before the committee tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, if that suits your convenience.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that would be excellent, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAYLOR. In fact, we would appreciate that very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROOKS. Which witness is that?

Digitized by Google

Mr. TAYLOR. The one from Utah, and the other one who is right here. I have one witness dealing solely with the Army phase of it and the other dealing solely with the naval phase of it.

Mr. BROOKS. We have 20 minutes now, gentlemen, and we could proceed with the next witness and then adjourn at noon to go over to the floor and take up tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

If that is all right with the committtee and it is all right with you, we will proceed accordingly.

Mr. SMART. Which witness would you prefer to proceed with at this time?

Mr. TAYLOR. If you are going to adjourn promptly at 12—I notice it is now a quarter of—I would really like to keep them together because there is continuity——

Mr. BROOKS. That being the case, if there is no objection the committee will stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee.

(Whereupon, at 11:45 a. m., the committee adjourned until Wednesday, March 9, 1949, at 10 a. m.)

UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a.m., Hon. Overton Brooks (chairman of Subcommittee No. 1) presiding.

Mr. BROOKS. Gentlemen, the committee will please come to order.

I might say this morning we have these CBS microphones. The entire proceeding in the committee, as I understand, will be recorded, but the idea is that high lights in the testimony will be canned, so to speak, for use at some future time.

So I suggest, gentlemen, that you frame your questions accordingly, with the knowledge that they may later go on out over the air.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, are you going to make the same suggestion to the witnesses?

Mr. BROOKS. Under that prompting, I make the same suggestion to the witnesses.

We are very happy this morning to have Gen. John Charles Taylor of the American Legion here.

General Taylor has some witnesses he is going to present to the committee. And I want to say, General, that we are always glad to have you before this committee. It is a distinct pleasure to have you. And I want you, if you will to present your witnesses to the committee. Then we can proceed with their testimony.

STATEMENT OF GEN. JOHN CHARLES TAYLOR, REPRESENTING THE AMERICAN LEGION

General TAYLOR. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee. The Legion certainly appreciates this opportunity. As you know last session, Mr. Chairman, we were helpful, I hope, in the legislation which was favorably reported by the committee and eventually as a result of all of our efforts included in the Selective Service Act when it passed the Senate and so became a part of law.

Presently, however, with unification, the problem has become a broader one. And this is something that the American Legion is deeply interested in. We have three and a half million members in the American Legion.

Two and a quarter million of them are World War II men. And we have over a million members in our American Legion Auxiliary. And this of course is something that has been before us for years. So we welcome this opportunity.

Digitized by Google

And I have here with me today as our witnesses—because we have divided it into two phases: The one dealing with the Army and Air Force, I will say, and the other phase dealing with the Navy—first of all, Franklin Riter a very outstanding member of the bar of the State of Utah.

In fact, he is a member of the bar in New York, Oregon, California. Utah, and Texas, and a member of the Supreme Court of the United States. He is a member of the Judge Advocate Association and the American Bar Association, and for many years was chairman of the property section of the Utah State bar.

In 1942 he sailed for England as a member of the original cadre which established the branch office of the Judge Advocate General in the European theater of operations, at Cheltenham, England.

And this branch was established, as you know, by order of the President. The office exercised its appeal at jurisdiction over courts martial of the theater until it was terminated by order of the President in February 1946.

He was chairman of the original board of review in the branch office as constituted by the President, and upon the increase of the panels of the court to five he acted as the coordinator of the boards.

He is the only officer who served in the branch office during the entire period of its existence.

And then, I have with me John J. Finn, who is the judge advocate for the American Legion for the District of Columbia and who for 33 months of the time that he served in the Navy was in the Office of the Judge Advocate General. He served on the board of review set up by the Judge Advocate General's office.

He assisted Judge McGuire and his committee in its inquiries which led to the conclusions set out in the report of the committee set up by Mr. Forrestal. He was the recorder and a member of the Ballantine Board then set up for the Navy.

So both of these witnesses are excellent lawyers in private and civilian practice presently, and I think they can give the committee some of the information and some of the facts that they are desirous of knowing.

And in particular, they can present the point of view of the American Legion, and after all that is what we are interested in: The point of view of the veteran as distinguished from the man who is in uniform.

From their long experience and their long actual experience with this entire problem, I know they can be of great assistance to this committee.

And Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I certainly express my appreciation for the American Legion for this opportunity to appear before you.

Mr. BROOKS. General Riter, you have a prepared statement?

STATEMENT OF GEN. FRANKLIN RITER ON BEHALF OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

General RITER. I have and it has been filed with the recorder.

Mr. BROOKS. Just have a seat, sir, and proceed.

General RITER. Gentlemen of this subcommittee, I first must express my appreciation of this opportunity of representing the great American Legion. I am commander of the Department of Utah in the Legion today.

Digitized by Google

Since my return to civilian life after nearly 7 years' service, 4 years of which were overseas in that show, I have continued my interest and study of military justice.

It is not just casual conclusions that I have reached, but during the period of the long armistice I was a service officer and taught in Reserve officer's classes, as well as serving short tours of duty, and during that time observed the functioning of military justice.

Therefore, my conclusions are not hasty.

I want first to indicate to you gentlemen that the American Legion presents no program or ideas that will tear down our armed forces or their efficiency. An Army and a Navy has only one purpose, and that is to fight wars and win battles. They are not a social-service organization. They are not a reform organization.

And the last thing in the world that this great organization to which I belong desires is to do anything that would impair the efficiency of the services as a fighting force. On the other hand, the American Legion visions the new world and the new Army that we are living in and have today.

During that period of the small Army of 150,000 or 160,000 men, I suppose that the 1920 code that came out of that memorable investigation conducted primarily by the late Senator Warren of Wyoming, Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin, and the then Senator Wadsworth of New York, represented a great advance.

The history of that legislation, with the prolonged investigation, which was cut across by the feud between General Crowder and General Ansell, was indicative that as far as 30 years ago the legal profession—the profession to which I belonged and have devoted my life—was fully aware that we were in an evolutionary process and that no longer would the point of view in the approach to this problem be one of a small professional Army.

Let me remind you that there was a thesis that was laid down—and we found that in some of the law cases, even as high as the Supreme Court—that when a man put on a uniform he surrendered some of his rights as a free citizen.

It came into existence under that theory of contract of enlistment that a man did not have to belong to the Army or the Navy unless he voluntarily enlisted, and out of it came that curious theory that he surrendered certain constitutional rights.

Now I for one, from the beginning to the end, have asserted that the fifth and sixth amendments, with all the benefits, privileges, and rights thereunder, was applicable to the armed forces of this Nation except insofar as the provisions in the sixth amendment concerning presentment to the grand jury that our founders wrote into it.

With those exceptions that are stated in the face of it, I believe and I sincerely believe this morning that an American citizen when he proudly puts on the uniform of his country does not surrender those constitutional protections.

And, in my capacity as a member of the board of review in Europe, I have written opinions to that effect. And I have asserted it and I assert it this morning, notwithstanding the curious belief written by General Crowder and filed in the Warren investigation, where he asserted that those constitutional protections did not exist for the soldier or sailor in our forces.

Digitized by Google

And I want to make it plain to you that my remarks this morning are premised on that proposition that an American citizen when he puts on the uniform does not surrender his constitutional rights. And that is very important in some of the points I am going to discuss.

There is a very serious question of public relations involved in this, because no longer are we going to have a small professional Army of 100,000 or 175,000 men. We are going to have, thank God, a certain number of men who will devote their lives to the matter of national security.

The professional soldier, airman and sailor—we need them. And any of my remarks here today are not in derogation of those fine men in the least.

But I do assert to you that the Army that we will have—and my remarks are primarily devoted to the Army and the Air Force and not the Navy, as my associate, Mr. Finn, will cover that—will be a revolving Army, with men with 3, 4, or maybe 5 years in the service returning again to their civilian occupations.

And, consequently, I make a special plea here this morning that our professionals—our professional sailor men and our professional soldiers—please adjust their viewpoint to the fact that they must maintain a public relationship toward this revolving body of men so that when they return them to civil life they return them as friends and not as enemies.

And that is one of the premises that the American Legion comes here this morning with, because we are devoted to the cause of national defense.

I invite you gentlemen's attention to the fact that, during those dreadful days of pacifism through which we lived in the twenties and early thirties, what little visible force we had was all but destroyed through the subversive forces in America; it was the American Legion that was steadfast and valorous in the cause of an adequate national defense.

And that is why we stand forth as the leading sponsors of universal military training, because we believe that is the democratic process in this land of ours. So, on that premise, I invite you gentlemen's attention in this proposed bill to several matters that I consider of importance.

Now, I listened with great interest to Mr. Bryan's remarks here yesterday. Mr. Bryan and I, a year and a half ago, at the time H. R. 2575 (the Elston bill) was pending, had several personal conferences on this subject.

Now, theoretically, and in the ideas of a perfectionist, I agree with Mr. Bryan that the appointment of the courts—and I direct my remarks primarily to the general courts because Mr. Bryan did—by the Judge Advocate General would be desirable.

But I say to you gentlemen that, after close and careful study, not of a few months but of years, it is imposing an administrative impossibility upon the Judge Advocate General to do that.

Now, Mr. Bryan speaks of having panels submitted to the Judge Advocate General for the selection of the courts by him. That does not mean anything, because those panels would originate at the same sources where the court would be appointed under the present system.

And you may be pretty sure that the desires of the commanding officer of the Fifth Infantry Division or the Normandy Base would show itself through those panels coming up to the Judge Advocate General. So, you gain nothing by it whatsoever.

And, furthermore, there is the administrative feature. It would require a personnel over here in the Pentagon devoting its entire time to the selection of those men. It is my deliberate opinion that such a plan is physically and practically impossible.

And I reach that conclusion with a good deal of mental travail because I liked Mr. Bryan's idea behind it; but, having lived through this as I did through 7 years, serving a year and half first in Washington here and then another year and a half when I returned from Europe, I am forced to the conclusion that it, from a practical standpoint, will net us nothing.

Furthermore, the other witness that appeared here yesterday discussed having a corps, say, appoint the court for a division, an army for a corps, and so on. It results in the same thing. Let us recognize the fact that probably the commanding general of the division would never see the panel recommended. It would be his chief of staff or one of his staff officers. Let us recognize just what it is.

And when you get all through with it, whether it is appointed directly by the Judge Advocate General's office here in Washington or by the judge advocate of a higher echelon, you get the same men as you would get in the first place, because you may be pretty sure that the same men would be sent up there on those panels as would be appointed if the division commander or the base commander appointed them in the first place.

Mr. RIVERS. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Rivers.

Mr. RIVERS. General, are you going to suggest an alternative?

General RITER. Yes. I am going to tell you what I will suggest to you. And this will not be a popular one. But I want you to take that section here that prohibits interference or undue pressure with the court—article 37—and I want you to write into it a jail and fine provision enforceable in the United States district court and indictable under the civil law.

And I believe I am the first man that ever suggested that. I can find no other remedy to this situation.

Mr. DOYLE. Page 32.

General RITER. Take your article 37. It is an offense now probably under what we would call 96 or under proposed article 98 for deliberate violation of the provisions of the code. But I do not think that means anything. I agree with Mr. Bryan.

I agree with Mr. Wels. To leave it as it is means nothing, because can you imagine an outraged major or captain who has had visitations placed upon him by the appointing authority filing charges against the division commander? Well, I can't.

And then it would leave it to come from above, and I am pretty sure that, except in some case that invited public attention, no action would be taken. So my best thought on it is that that article 37 be amended so as to make it an indictable offense in the Federal courts, with a jail sentence or fine, or both on top of it.

And you can use the classical $5,000 or 5 years. It would transfer the prosecution into the United States district attorney's office. And

Digitized by Google

I have no constitutional difficulty with it for an offense committed in France or Italy or Europe because of the Blackner case, you remember, coming out of the Doheny affair, where Mr. Blackner fled to France and committed his offense.

Mr. RIVERS. Now——

General RITER. So, I have no constitutional difficulty with the thing because that would be an offense against the process of justice against the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. General, that would be a requirement that in the event anyone attempted to influence the decisions of any court——

General RITER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. In the armed services.

General RITER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. That action would then be punishable by fine and imprisonment not to exceed $5,000 or 5 years.

General RITER. I want the jurisdiction spread into the Federal courts. I do not want that left in a military-justice code. Leave it there. It makes duality of jurisdiction. But I want the United States district attorney to say in New York sitting over that thing.

And I will tell you this much: A general would be a fool, with that kind of thing facing him, to go monkeying with it. I admit it is moral pressure, more than practical.

Mr. RIVERS. You better think that through and look at the practical application of that suggestion.

General RITER. I have.

Mr. RIVERS. But let me make this observation, because my mind is just as open as anybody else's. We should also think about the statute of limitations, in preferring these charges, because nobody will have the nerve to even suggest such a thing until he becomes a civilian.

General RITER. I was going to touch on that, sir.

Mr. RIVERS. I see, sir.

General RITER. It is a corollary matter. You have to expand your statute of limitations so your statute starts to run, say, 3 years after the emergency or the war is declared.

Mr. RIVERS. I see.

General RITER. You have to change that. You cannot leave your statute run, allowing it to be barred.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right.

General RITER. Because you are going to be pretty sure that if there is any criminal prosecution instituted it is going to follow at least when the general comes back to the United States.

Mr. RIVERS. That is right.

General RITER. But I cannot, gentlemen, reach any other conclusion on that, because, as much as I like Mr. Bryan's idea, it is the practical aspect of it. And I want to introduce into this a moral pressure, so that a staff judge advocate, when he stands up to his general, will say, "General, I disagree with you. Now, you're boss, but listen; you have a penal provision facing you here."

I know this much: There is not any of us who would not take a second thought on the thing.

Mr. RIVERS. You would not suggest, though, that we abandon the idea of an independent Judge Advocate's office; would you?

General RITER. Oh, well, listen, I am one of the original men that fought for that separate promotion list.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RIVERS. So, in addition to what you have suggested, have a separate Judge Advocate General's office, too.

General RITER. Yes, but that does not get to this proposition of——

Mr. RIVERS. I mean in addition to this proposition. You would have a double grant.

General RITER. Oh, I am devoted to that. All the power you give to the Judge Advocate General I am for, because I think it is a safeguard. But I want to reach into this problem that the American Legion considers, sir, absolutely critical.

We do not want to destroy the disciplinary powers. We want to as far as possible make it practical. Now let me just give you the picture when General Patton broke through St. Lo and made the run around the end and squeezed Paris.

General Patton—and this is from my own observations of the records of trial coming up from the Third Army—had the greatest of difficulty himself to convene a court because they were out there fighting a war.

To have Myron Cramer, who is Judge Advocate General, sitting back here in Washington trying to pick a court for George Patton's army making that fast run around the end just presents a physical impossibility.

And then, when you get over to General MacArthur's theater, to think of trying to impose that here at Washington is out of the question. It is impossible. The alternative, as Mr. Wels has suggested, I believe, is at the higher echelon. But you would get back to the same proposition. You would get the same men.

Now, if this Congress can work out a scheme where it is practical, fine. But I do not think it can be done. And I want to see this penal provision written in there. I have stood for it for years, and I believe it is an effective means of serving notice upon civilian and military men alike that these courts of ours in the Navy and in the Army are courts and they are not administrative arms of the generals. We had that fine-spun theory for years. It was very offensive——

Mr. BROOKS. General, would you not make your suggestion cover not only Army personnel, so as not to influence a service court but also anyone else?

General RITER. Certainly. Some of the most invidious things that we have had was the attempted influence of civilians upon military courts. It is something that a lot of us do not like to discuss very much, but it has been there, and it has been abandoned.

And I would make it a penal offense. Why should not the military courts, with the tremendous jurisdiction that they are acquiring, have all the protection that we afford our civil courts as to interfering with the processes of justice? I believe they should.

Mr. RIVERS. Why, of course.

Mr. DURHAM. You mean you would extend it to civilians, too?

General RITER. Yes; I would, indeed. Anybody.

Mr. RIVERS. Surely.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Doyle wanted to ask you a question.

General RITER. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Doyle, from California.

General RITER. Yes.

Mr. DOYLE. The general has already answered my question; thanks.

General RITER. Now I come on to another subject here. It was not discussed yesterday either by Mr. Bryan or Mr. Wels. That is this matter of pretrial investigation. It is one of the most bothersome and troublesome problems that they have.

If you will examine the testimony before the Warren subcommittee 30 years ago, you will find suggestions that this pretrial investigation under A. W. 70 of the 1920 code was to be similar to a committing magistrate's hearing in civil life.

Now, very early after the adoption of the 1920 code, the Judge Advocate General, in a series of opinions, held that pretrial investigation after the filing of charges was jurisdictional and that a failure to comply in a substantial, material manner with the requirements of A. W. 70 destroyed the jurisdiction of the general court. That seems to have been the opinion and the law for 15 or 20 years.

Early in the Mediterranean campaign, however, when this matter of pretrail investigation became crucial, we had a board of review opinion approved by the Judge Advocate General that reversed that and held that A. W. 70—the pretrial investigation provision—was directional only, and that the failure to comply in the substantial manner with the provisions of A. W. 70 did not interfere with the jurisdiction of the court.

It was a Judge Advocate General's ruling on an opinion by a board of review sitting in Washington; and all boards of review throughout the world—both the European theater, the CBI, and the Pacific southwest theaters—felt that it was necessary to follow that rule, although it was a complete reversal of 15 or 20 years' standing.

After the war was over and the habeas corpus started to appear—and on my return from Europe I was given special assignment, living in the Federal courts down here defending a number of these habeas corpuses along with Colonel Hughes—we had the notorious Hicks case appear up in the middle district of Pennsylvania, with Judge Biggs, now in the circuit court of appeals, writing the opinion.

Now, the interesting thing about the Hicks case was that Hicks was charged with rape on an Englishwoman. There was enough evidence there, in testing it by my civil standards, that had I been a trial judge I would have sent that case to the jury.

There was a conflict in evidence. There was the whole question of consent and that typical thing in your rape case. But when Hicks landed back here at Lewisburg, under a sentence that had been substantially reduced, he employed counsel and commenced habeas corpus proceedings.

And in the Hicks case—Hicks v. Hyatt, in 64 Federal Supplement 238—Judge Biggs held that compliance with the pretrial investigation was jurisdictional and that, since there were defects which he discoverd in habeas corpus proceeding, the general court sitting there at the western base section in England had no jurisdiction over Hicks and the judgment of conviction was void.

The Hicks case has produced a tremendous amount of difficulty both for the Department of Justice, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and the Judge Advocate General, because, remember, on those appeals on one side it must be conducted by the Solicitor General.

Now, simultaneously we had the same type of proceedings originating out in Kansas, Ohio, Oklahoma, and Georgia. We had a series of cases that adopted in principle the Hicks doctrine, but found substantial compliance with A. W. 70. There is a great group of those cases today, some of them finding substantial compliance and denying the writ, and others finding lack of compliance and following the theory of the Hicks case and setting the man free. There is the greatest confusion in the law today on it.

Now I note with interest how the draftsmen of this proposed code have met that situation, and I think they have met it bravely, and I approve of it. They declare that noncompliance with the pretrial investigation requirements is not jurisdictional, but that upon being invited to the attention of the court, shall take one of two actions.

It shall either order a further and an additional investigation and report it back to the convening authority, or it shall recess until the accused and his counsel are placed in possession of evidence discovered at the pretrial investigation.

It appears to me that that is the satisfactory answer to that problem, because operating, if you will permit me, with the new discovery provisions of the civil rules of our Federal courts, that right of discovery is an important thing.

I have a case now pending up in Wisconsin where my whole case is built on my ability to go in and discover the records of the defendant company. Otherwise I could not prove my case.

In some of our States that right of discovery has not been elaborated as it has in the Federal rules. But right there is an example where there should be the greatest amount of discovery not only on the part of the prosecution but on the part of the defense.

And all evidence discovered should be readily made available. And, as Mr. Bryan or Mr. Wels suggested, not only the testimony of witnesses but any documents should be turned over to the defense.

We cannot conduct litigation today on the old principle that it is a game of chance. We lawyers are insisting that there be frankness in disclosing your evidence before trial. And I believe that that principle must be carried forward here. And it appears to me that this provision as now written meets that situation.

Now that brings me to my whole pet of the thing, and that is article 44, the double-jeopardy provision, which has been carried forward from the 1920 code. And let me read it to you. It is not long:

> No person shall without his consent be tried a second time for the same offense, but no proceeding in which accused has been found guilty by a court martial upon any charge or specification shall be held to be a trial in the sense of this article until a finding of guilty has been final after review of the case has been fully completed.

That is an archaic provision, gentlemen, that must go, because the day before yesterday there was argued in the Supreme Court, just a few blocks down the street here, the famous Wade case on habeas corpus.

And that case is my pet, because for 30 years this section 44 of the uniform code has been offensive to any lawyer that I have ever talked to. It is archaic in the sense that it keeps only "autre fois acquit; autre fois convict"—the old common law idea that there had to be a verdict before jeopardy could attach.

That is, a man had to be acquitted or he had to be convicted before he could plead. We know that that is not the law under the fifth amendment today—that jeopardy can attach in our civil courts as soon as the jury is sworn and the first witness sworn.

Digitized by Google

And yet the military courts have attempted to perpetuate that archaic rule. Now Wade was convicted of rape. He had a full trial. The court went into closed session to deliberate upon its verdict.

It came out an hour later and told the judge advocate:

We want you to bring before the court the father and mother of the complaining witness and want to hear their testimony. And we will adjourn this court until the call of the president. Bring them here.

A few days later the commanding general of that infantry division transmitted the case to another outfit further up on the line and asked him to take jurisdiction and try the man because the witnesses were available at that point. That jurisdiction transmitted it to a third jurisdiction. And Wade was brought to trial on the charges before a new court.

His counsel, Richard Brewster, of Kansas City—and the case is unique in this respect—who was his defense counsel in that court-martial proceeding in Europe, argued his case the day before yesterday in the Supreme Court of the United States.

He has continued that case straight through from beginning to the end. At the second trial he presented a completely extended stenographic record of the first trial and made the plea of double jeopardy.

And it was promptly denied under this archaic article because the general had withdrawn the charges before they had been acted upon.

It came up to the board of review. The board of review No. 4, composed of three very fine lawyers from civil life—one who is now in Washington, one who lives at Scottsbluff, Nebr., and one at Center, Tex.—wrote a memorable opinion on it.

The Assistant Judge Advocate General differed from it in this respect: In his endorsement he did not like this archaic doctrine displaced by this, and for the first time there was introduced into the interpretation of this statute—in order to save the coustitutionality of it, we believe—the doctrine of imperious necessity.

We found because of endorsements in the record that there was an imperious necessity in view of a tactical condition on the battlefront that prohibited the production of the witnesses at the first trial.

The curious thing is that Justice Murrow, who wrote the opinion in the trial court—that is, in the district court in the habeas corpus proceeding; I forget who wrote it in the circuit court of appeals reversing Justice Murrow—and the circuit court of appeals both take the same premise, that this statute is not complete and that the doctrine of imperious necessity prevailing in the Federal courts—that is, that jeopardy may attach before verdict—prevails notwithstanding this article in the military courts.

Then the decision goes off, and where Murrow the trial-court judge differed with the circuit court of appeals was whether proof of imperious necessity had been established.

I make a special plea to Congress to take that archaic article away from us and put a modern article in that would——

Mr. BROOKS. General, would you want to suggest changes? Would you submit to the committee any changes?

General RITER. I have not attempted, sir, to draft any statutory changes on the thing. In re Cornero, a circuit court of appeals decision—and undoubtedly it will be cited here in the Supreme Court decision on it—carried language that could be very well carried over into a statutory enactment.

Digitized by Google

It recognizes the common-law pleas of former conviction former acquittal, and then the proposition that jeopardy may attach before findings. The Wade case is a classical example of what will happen in allowing the convening authority to take two bites at the cherry.

It was obvious there because Wade was charged with another soldier and the other soldier was acquitted, and it was obvious what was going to happen in the Wade case. There was going to be an acquittal.
